The Federal army slept on quietly until daylight, for Curtis knew that his diminutive army needed all the rest which circumstances might afford. A muffled reveille, a hasty breakfast, and the men stept quietly into ranks. There is a grand solemnity in a "line of battle," especially so, when you expect every moment to hear the cannons thundering the soldiers' death-knell. About 9 A. M., General Osterhaus advanced. His cavalry dashed into an open field, on which the enemies' right rested, and where the 4th Louisiana were deployed as skirmishers, and here commenced the desperate game. Gen. Carr held our right. Sigel's division was the reserve. General Davis now abandoned his position, and advanced to the support of Osterhaus. About 4 P. M. the engagement became general. McCulloch hurled on his veteran troops with the energy of despair; but they were met with firmness, and forced to retire under a galling fire of canister, shot and shell, as often as they attempted to force our position. Colonel Dodson, of the 15th Arkausas, charged one of our batteries, and carried it with the bayonet. It was planted on the extreme of Pattison's Brigade, and that brigade was the left of our "line." The battery was manned at once, and a murderous enfilading fire was opened on us, which swept the entire line from left to right. At the same time McIntosh advanced with his In-
