BOOK WORLD NOTES

MEMOIRS OF ALEXANDER DUMAS, translated by Mrs. Waller. The MacMillan Company, New York.

The last volume of the Memoirs of Alexander Dumas is published this week (June 9), by the MacMillan Company. Although a book of more than six hundred pages, it covers a period of no more than two years, 1832 and 1833. Like its predecessors, however, the volume, the sixth in the series, is crowded with what Andrew Lang describes as "the humor, the goodness of heart, the overflowing joy in life, which make the charm of the novels." In 1891 two small volumes of extracts from these memoirs were published, but it is surprising that this is the first time the English-speaking world has had a real opportunity to become acquainted with a work which critics agree in asserting to be the equal in interest of the famous romances themselves. "Mrs. Waller, the translator," says a writer in the Atlantic Monthly, "her publishers, and Mr. Andrew Lang in his graceful introduction, have unquestionably rendered a considerable service to English literature."

An incurable boy all his life, the memoirs, overflow, as Mr. Lang says, with Dumas's joy in life, but they contain, in addition, an inexhaustible mine of information for the student of a past age. The whole of hothooded, visionary, enthusiastic Paris passes before us in these pages, with their profusion of anecdotes, their narratives of dramatic triumphs and failures, political plots and riots, friendships and hatred, the whole tumbling, fascinating life of a young genius mounting rapidly to his great fame. And if these volumes are invaluable to the student, to the average Anglo-Saxon reader they will open a new world as alluring as the world seeks, rather, to give his portrait a created for us.

LITERARY NOTES.

(The Bobbs-Merrill Company.) The following dispatch recently emanated from New Orleans:

"H. A. Folk, of 1394 Dryas street, claims to have found a process by which the magazines on all the battleships belonging to the navy of the world may be destroyed by an operator in a wireless telegraph station miles away from the ships."

"Folk, who is quite a young man, is an adept student of the wireless system which Marconi started, but it has only been during the last three or four months that he has found the way in which the protected magazines of battleships may be reached by the tiny electric spark and set off. Folk was seen this afternoon and admitted that he had found the way in which he could explode the magazine of a battleship from a wireless station miles away, but stated that as he was now negotiating with the United States government, the agents of which had requested his strict secrecy on the subject, he could not give out anything for publication about the manner in which the wireless worked performing its task."

"The news of Folk's invention was first made known by his brother, who notified the newspapers. Folk himself deplored the fact that his brother had told anything of his findings, and seemed fearful lest anything about his discovery should get into print, claiming that he had made an ironclad agreement with the government to keep the matter secret until such time as a test would be made under its direction at a point that would be selected by it."

"If the invention that Folk claims he has made is practical it will revolutionize the warfare of the world, for with a wireless instrument one man could destroy an entire battleship fleet in a few minutes without leaving his wireless station."

Our personal opinion is that Mr. Folk has been reading Elusive Isabel, Jacques Futrelle's new novel, in which France and Italy plot to explode all the English and American submarine mines by wireless; and that he thereupon dreamed a dream.

In the railroad station of one of our larger cities recently two gentlemen, in clerical garb, were discussing the merits of modern novels, the conversation evidently being caused by the fact that one of the clergymen carried a copy of a recent popular romance. He asked his brother minister if he had read this work, saying that for himself he always found it necessary to sandwich his theological studies with the reading of interesting novels. The other replied, "Yes, and, like yourself, I am an admirer of Emerson Hough. An educated man when he reads a novel desires more than an interesting story; he wants it to be written in good English, and the better written it is the better it is for his own style of expression. A well-written novel, if the story is entertaining is as helpful in improving one's ability to express himself in good English as if he spent the time in the study of great models, and, what is of most importance, he obtains this benefit without the exertion of study, but while he is pursuing recreation. And this is very important to a professional man, who has to devote so much time to the study of subjects intimately connected with his calling. Hough, I find, always writes interest-
