It a stranger makes inquiry on the street, either of a man or a boy, the greatest pains is not only taken to give the right direction, but they will even follow you to see that you make no mistake, and when you stop to look around in perplexity, you will generally find the same kindly stranger at your elbow to point the way again. Even on entering a large or treatment, all the waiters how to you, and so on entering or leaving a store, the proprietor follows you to the door, and the clerks make their obeisance to you with all the grace of a dancing master. It is singular that such a people, apparently so kind and courteous, are so given to deception and downright knavery in all their dealings. The ladies of our party, in their little shopping excursions, have invariably found an attempt to increase charges from their first agreement, under some plea of error or mistake. There is an attempt to overcharge in everything, unless the agreement is in writing. In conversation to-day with proprietor of the American restaurant on the Exhibition grounds, ne aptly remarked that "the people of Vienra were the most courteous and agreeable he had ever met with, and as lavish with their money as Americans; but," he added, "they seem to take pleasure in cheating everybody they deal with.

man character that were it not for the tanguage, we might suppose ourselves among a population of vivacious and excitable Frenchmen. Hundreds of boys are always on hard at the Bourse, who rapidly copy the bulletins of prizes, and rush off through the Ringstrasse, offering them for sale to every passer-by, and nding more purchasers among the women than the men. The females are also the principal purchasers of the lottery tickets, being easily deceived by the flaming announcements of fortunes gained by the investment of a few florins. How contrary to the American idea of the German character is all this!

life, when its owner was pinioned, a rope about his neck, with the other end tied to the limb of a tree, while a savage and unrelenting "Committee of Safety" stood around, waiting for the barrel, on which the poor wretch stood, to be kicked out from under him. The doomed man was a gambler but he was a quiet peaceable follow who harved Sheridan's Escape at Appomattox.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Press wretch stood, to be kicked out from under him. The doomed man was a gambler but he was a quiet. peaceable fellow, who harmed no one. One night he had won a sum of money from a man who belonged to a committee of Safety, at d the latter attempted to make him give it back. In the affair which ensued a vacancy was made in the committee. This is what had brought Sam A—into the presence of death there under the tree. The two men before referred to had gone among the mob, and by entreaty and expostulation had succeeded in getting the poor fellow's sudden sentence "commuted," on condition that he should leave town in thirty minutes. They took him down off a barrel, untied the rope from his neck, and Cheyenne saw him no more. After five years he and one of the preservers of his life met thus by odd chance. It is well enough to add that the life was saved to some purpose, for the man who "stood upon the barrel" is now the trusted agent of a Mining Company operating in Montana, and is in all respects a useful citizen. It was a close shave,—St. Louis Republican. relates the following incident:

In Georgia I heard an incident in connection with Lieutenant General Sheridan, which Little Phil will read with some little surprise, and lay down the paper with some grateful feelings toward the gallant soldier who saved his life. The night previous to the sur ender of Lee at Appomattox, Gen. who saved his life. The night previous to the sur ender of Lee at Appomattox, Gen. John B. Gordon, who commanded Stonewall Jackson's old corps, Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, commanding the cavalry, and Gen. Longstreet, held a consultation with Gen. R. E. Lee. At this consultation it was agreed that Gen. Gordon should try the federal strength on the following day. Sheridan was in command opposite Gordon. In accordance with the pr gramme, Gordon made his demonstrations the next day and was met by Sheridan's cavalry, which he gallantly repulsed, but finding Sheridan supported by large numbers of of infantry, fell back and sent this intelligence to Gen. R. E. Lee. Upon its receipt Gen. Lee ordered the firing to cease, and displayed the white flag, under which the surrender was subsequently made. During the cessation of hostilities, and while Generals Grant and Lee were in consultation, Gen.

render was subsequently made. During the cessation of hostilities, and while Generals Grant and Lee were in consultation, Gen. Sheridan, with a large retinue of officers and men—about one hundred in all—was seen approaching Gen. Gordon's lines. Ot course, this cavalcade, as it came dashing across the plain, challenged the attention of Gordon's entire force. Chancing to turn his head, Gen ral Gordon saw a long, lank Mississippian within a few yards of him deliberately training his cocked rifle on the approaching horsemen. Gordon dashed at the marksman and rode him down, with an exclamation more emphatic than refined. "What do you mean, sir?" thundered the irate Gordon; "don't you know firing has ceased by my order?" "I know, General," replied Mississippi, as he gathered himself up, "but I thought it were a ridgment a comin' agin us, and I jist sighted that short-legged fellar thar, ard if you ham't come sup I d a fetched him from where he sot, and he's been a powerful heap of good to the Yanks." That man was one of the best shots in the division, and never tailed to kill his object when deliberate aim was had. Gordon turned to meet Sheridan, and Buchanan Read's hero has never known how near his life came to going out with the rebellion. A REMINISCENCE OF JIM FISK .- Speakng of the Paris opera house, a correspondent tells a little story of one of the late Jim Fisk's agent to Paris to Jules Simon, minister of fine arts, proposing to lease the building, fin-ish it at his own expense, and open it with a splendid coterie of artists. What strikes me most forcibly in the clever defe se, if delense it can be called, which seems more a defiance, is the pure mercenary and mer hantable view which the eloquent Wisconsin senator takes of his high position and grave public duties. Honor seems to count for little with him, patriotism far less, According to his estimate, a United States senator is miserably pai, even at $7500, because, with the same outlay of ability and energy, he might make more at the bar, or in banking or railroading. Forensic genius, the divine gift of eloquence, is a marketable commodity, merely, to be sold to the highest bidder. A great theme inspires it no more than a big fee. He argues upon the assumption that the Senate is composed exclusively of picked men, whose intellect, wisdom, and culture represent the consummate flower and the

that the Senate is composed exclusively of picked men, whose intellect, wisdom, and culture represent the consummate flower and the perfect fruit of republican institutions—men who could, therefore, command in their various callings and professions the highest pay for their executive and oratorical abilities. There may be gentlemen who make social and pecu. Jary sacrifices in coming to the Senate; but I believe there are very few of this sort, and these manage to console and recompense themselves—some by an honest, old-lashioned seuse of pa riotic service; some by the gayeties and parades of the cap tal; so ne by Credit Mobilier and other speculations and some oy a large and lucrative practice in the supreme court, for which they coolly take the time popularly supposed to belong by contract to beir constituents. Mr. Carpenter states that he canuot rent "a decent furnished house in Washington for less than $2000." Now, people's ideas of decency in architec ure and uphoistery, vary strangely. I have known a cabinet minister pay a far more modest rent than that, and yet live not only decently, but with comfort, the modern conveniences, and something very much like elegance and refinement. But, to be sure, he was a rare gentleman, and his surroundings took or decency and dignity from him. He did not stay long in office. Really, luxurious living, liveris, and hne turn-outs are of much less consequence, even in Washington, than Jenkins or Jeemes would have as believe Brains still count here, and character weighs. A noble pr.vate life still does mode for a man than many dinners, and one great speech in the Senate cheers the heart more than the choicmany dinners, and one great speech in the Senate cheers the heart more than the choicest wines. It has a "bouquet" to it that does not vanish with the quaffing. The glitter of plate-glass and gliding sheds no glamour over the judgment of the people. Their representatives havits may concern them, but not his habitation.
