Examination Follows the Lines Laid

Down in the Hipple Case. Pierre, S. D., Special. - The Hipple examination has dragged through another day. Justice Jacobsen decided to allow Deputy Treasurer Barrington to testify as to payments made into the state treasury by Hipple subsequent to the time he turned over the office to his successor. He testified as to the payment, on Jan. 21, 1897, of the $1,400 and the last payment after Examiner Taylor's investigation. The court adjourned with Barrington still on the stand.

Pierre, S. D., Special - The preliminary examination in the case of J. E. Hipple was brought to a close by Justice Jacobson binding the accused over to the next term of court. When the amount of the bond was to be fixed State's Attorney Estes urged that it be $2,000. The attorneys for the defense, however, pleaded the fact that Mr. Hipple had exhausted his pecuniary means in raising the money to pay back to the state and that a large bond would be a hardship upon him. These arguments seemed to have considerable weight with the justice, who fixed the bond at $500. The defense claim that they did not expect to succeed in knocking out the prosecution, but wished to ascertain the scope of the prosecution and the evidence avail-This is partially borne out by the fact that they cited few authorities in support of their contentions and noted carefully every case the state cited. From the amount of heat displayed during the examination and the appearance of the parties when Justice Jacobson announced his decision, there is ground to suspect that there is or less disappointment. The prosecution laugh at the idea that the defense has gained any material advantage from the preliminary examination, and claim that the plan of de-fense has been as plainly developed as the line of attack. While the feeling of approval over the result is general, there is an undercurrent of sympathy with Hipple, for the reason that it is believed that he has been more or less the tool of some one else.

Pierre, S. D., Special.-The hearing of Auditor Mayhew was taken up and bids fair to be another protracted struggle. The first fight was over the question of what section of the statute the prosecution was brought, and the state first refused to obey the ruling of the court. A motion was then made to dismiss the defendant, when the state announced that the complaint was drawn under section 6698, the same as in the Hipple case. The examination is on the same line as in the Hipple case.

KILLED IN A FIGHT.

Deputy Game Warden and Three Indians Are Dead.

Leech Lake Reservation, Special .-Information by special messenger has just reached this reservation that a fight occurred between two Indians and a game warden, in which all were killed, including one Indian woman. A deputy game warden, whose name can not be ascertained, arrived at an Indian camp on an island in a lake between Bemidji and the Cass Lake reservation, and seized two guns and a trapping outfit belonging to Kak-Kak-Quash and Mahcheannequah, two Indians who belong to the Cass Lake reserve, and also made an attempt to seize some furs which they had, but they resisted this, whereupon the warden clubbed the older Indian with a gun until he became unconscious, and then shot him. He then shot the other Indian and his wife, mortally wounding both. In the meantime, the older Indian, having recovered consciousness, shot and killed the warden Dr. E. S. Hart, overseer in charge of this subagency, has been investigating the matter and has decided to send Martin Branchaud and a detail of Indian police to the scene of the affray to investigate the matter thoroughly No detailed account of the fight can be had, as the only information yet received was brought in by an Indian boy 12 or 14 years of age, who witnessed the shooting.

Considerable excitement exists here among the Indians, and Dr. Hart is unwilling to express an opinion regarding the effect it may have upon them. The Indians consider the interference of their hunting privileges by game wardens as a violation of their treaty rights.

LEAPED TO DEATH.

An Appalling Double Tragedy at St.

St. Paul, Special.-An appalling double tragedy took place on the Smith avenue bridge Saturday afternoon, when Jacob Amos, a cigarmaker, and Henry Bergenkreuger, also a cigarmaker, hurled themselves, one after the other, from the highest span of the bridge to the river below, a distance of over 200 feet. The desperate acts were witnessed by a number of people en the bridge and in the vicinity, and appeared to have been deliberate and planned, but no one was near enough to the suicides to intercept them. Both bodies shot into space with the rapidity of lightning, each man jumping far out from the bridge and whirling over and over with quickening momentum gathered in the fall. Each struck the water with a sickening splash within a few seconds, and before the spectators realized what had happened two lives had been hurled into eternity under most tragic circumstances.

Following the leaps to death the scene of the suicides was one of intense excitement. The tremendous jump, the evident cool purpose and desperate determination, together with the rash, yet calm execution of what was doubtless an agreement between the men to seek death together, horrified the witnesses. Men ran to the spot where the suicides had plunged to the water and women grew faint with dread. But all were helpless to render any assistance after the fearful

The cause of the deeds of self destruction is largely speculative, but there is evidence to show that both men had been drinking, and the general version is that they bantered each other into jumping from the bridge while irresponsible from the effects of liquor. A strict search for the bodies was prosecuted by men in boats, but up to a late hour they had not been re-

CHARACTER OF THE TURK.

Obstinacy Is the Chief Feature of This Oriental.

The leading feature of the Turkish character is obstinacy, says Harper's Round Table: There is only one thing that will induce a Turk to do something he does not want to-that is force. When that is applied, or he sees it is going to be, he will give in. If he, however, thinks the other side is not in earnest he will hold out, and sometimes that brings him into trouble. That is the secret of Turkish diplomacy and it is that which gives other countries so much trouble in dealing with Turkey. A foreign diplomat once remarked that the right way to do business with the Turk was to take him by the throat, give him a good beating and then tell him to sit down and talk business. This was, however, rather a rough and extreme way of putting it. An old resident in Turkey I met on the first occasion I was in the country once gave me the sum of his experience in his dealings with them in the form of a story. I did not think at the time that I should within a few months have a practical illustration of its truth on my own account. But that is by the way. This is how the story

An old Turk, whom we will call Hassan Baba, owed money which he had borrowed from Abdullah, who had asked several times for its return. As both were Mussulmans, no interest was given or taken, believers being forbidden by the Koran to lend money to one another on usury. But Hassan Baba could never be induced to pay back his debt, and at last Abdullah, losing patience, had him up before the cadi or judge.

"You owe this money," said the ca-

"It is even so, Effendim," replied the lebtor. "Then you must pay it back," exclaimed the cadi, "or I must sentence you." "Be it so, Effendim. I do not pay,"

said the obstinate old man. "Then I sentence you to pay the money, and if you continue in your refusal, oh, Hassan Baba, I give you the choice whether you will take twentyfive strokes of the bastinado, eat a whole string of onions, or pay the money. In the name of the Merciful One, condemn vou." "Inshallah, Effendim! I will take the twenty-five strokes of the bastina-

The executioner of the court and his assistants were called and Hassan Baba, having been thrown on the floor and his feet fastened, soles uppermost, to the pole held by two men, the executioner proceeded to lay on. But before the twenty-five strokes had been administered old Hassan Baba cried out lustily: "In the name of the Most Merciful, oh, cadi, give the orders to cease." he exclaimed, "and I will eat the string of onions.' So, on the command of the cadi, he was let down, and a man was sent out to the market place for a string of onions. When he got back with them Hassan Baba went manfully to work to eat the onions, but before he had got to the end of them his stomach refused "Let it be as you say, oh, cadi! I will pay the money." Then undoing the girdle which he had around his waist, he produced the pieces, which he counted out to Abdullah before the cadi. "That," said my friend, "will give you a better idea of the character of the Turk than anything I can think of. He will take the beating, he will eat the onions, and he will pay you the money after all."
