Boldest Legislation Since the English Reform Bill.

Communism's Wedge Given an Entrance By the State in Germany.

The Complete Turning Point in the Legislation of This Century.

A Most Startling Programme of Social Reform.

Will It Not Prevail in Other Parts of Europe to Check the Rising Tide of Democracy and Poverty?

The German Reichstag has completed essentially a programme of social reform with what would seem to be the boldest piece of legislation since the English Reform bill.

The celebrated message of Emperor William I. of Nov. 17, 1881, concerned itself with the same dominant idea.

To supplement the scheme only the extension of existing laws is now required.

SOCIALISTIC DISCONTENT.

The great prosperity of the years 1871, 1872 and 1873 in Germany were followed by a crash. A feeling of marked depression obtained.

Socialism waxed strong. Its supporters polled a heavier vote and its exponents gave vent to freer, more ardent expression of their views.

The growing burden of European armaments was becoming a more and more intolerable burden.

The first steps were in the line of repressive legislation, and coercion neither placates nor soothes a brooding sense of injustice and a craving for redress.

As an outcome of the deliberations excited by the Socialist law came the Kaiser's message of Nov. 17, 1881. What was suggested and promised there has now become solidly incorporated as law which startled the Socialist faction in the Reichstag.

Insurance against the most serious evils which beset the working classes has been secured. They are sickness, accidents, incapacitation and old age.

The first marked feature of the Social legislation of the past eight years was the law of 1883, which looked to insurance as a provision against sickness.

He receives at the same time one-half of the normal local wages during the period of his sickness (not more than thirteen weeks), and if he is removed to a hospital those immediately depending on him receive one-half of his allowance.

ACCIDENTS PROVIDED FOR.

On June 27 of the following year, 1884, after several ineffectual attempts to bring it about, a law enforcing insurance against accidents also passed the Reichstag.

With a view to equitable mutual insurance those trades which offered an equal degree of risk combined. In 1886 there were sixty-four of these trade associations, numbering between three and four million workers.

ADVANTAGES AND PROVISIONS.

The London Times, in an article on "State Socialism in Germany," says about this: "The advantages are considerable. For complete disablement, two-thirds of the actual wage (if exceeding four marks, a diminishing fraction); for partial disablement, an equitable proportion of the same is granted as pension.

FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES.

The Bundestag proposed the only sound and equitable method of financing the present capital value of all obligations incurred on the starting of the scheme, and distribute the payments over present and future in such a manner that financing will not be a burden on any trifling alterations of detail should be in the future necessary.

ADDITIONAL PROVISIONS.

The result of these misgivings and outspoken complaints was a compromise which was decided to constitute the master on this basis: Contributions shall first be calculated for a period of ten years, and at a rate that will meet and mutual supervision, and necessary measures of prevention can be defrayed from the common purse.

"Such are the chief provisions of these two complicated acts. The former is considered successful—the latter can hardly yet be finally judged—though it is expensive in working, and its growing burden is regarded with some anxiety.

"But the measure now sanctioned is of quite a different character. In its scope are included almost without exception all persons above the age of sixteen, male and female, working in a dependent position for regular hire.

Existing state and communal arrangements for similar purposes are respected, stipulation being made that equal advantages shall be granted. The contribution offered by the state is secured for such establishments when they have obtained the approval of the Federal Council.

DIFFICULTIES OF THE SCHEME.

This is big expenditure, but the gigantic proportions of the undertaking are not the great difficulty. The most vital point is that this measure is of necessity an experimental one.

THE IMPERIAL CONTRIBUTION.

The most remarkable feature in the bill, says the London Times, is the contribution (Beitrag) of 50 marks added to each pension from the funds of the State.

current expenses, by a reserve fund of 20 per cent., and accumulate to cover the capitalized value of the pensions expected to fall due in that time (not the whole amount of obligations, but only the amount actually incurred). Fresh regulations on the same principle to be repeated for each successive period of five years until a condition of equilibrium is reached.

Another important financial point involved concerns the costs of administration. The labor involved is something enormous. The mere item of stocking in 11,000,000 stamps every week in the case of the Reichstag, to mark per head a small sum to set when it secures such prodigious work.
