Chapter XIV
An Evening at the Dance

The next day was fine and bright, and the sun shone as it had done the night before. The boys had been up early and had breakfasted before nine o'clock. They were going to have a good time that day, for they had arranged to visit some of the places of interest in the vicinity.

The first thing they did was to go to the station and get their train tickets. They were glad to be going on such an exciting journey. The train was due to leave at two o'clock, so they had plenty of time to make ready.

When they got to the station, the boys were full of anticipations. They had been told that the train was a very nice one, and they were looking forward to a comfortable ride.

At last it was time to go, and they stepped into the car with a feeling of satisfaction. The journey was delightful, for the country was very beautiful. The scenery was ever-changing, and there were many interesting sights to be seen.

They arrived at their destination in the afternoon, and wereMet at the station by a friend who had come to meet them. They were taken to their hotel, where they were to spend the night.

After supper, they went to the theatre, where they saw a fine performance. They were both delighted, and promised to go again.

The next day was equally interesting, for they visited several of the points of interest in the vicinity. They had a good time, and were sorry to leave at nightfall.

They returned to their hotel, where they were comfortably lodged.

On the morrow, they again went on a trip, and spent the day in sightseeing. They were most interested, and had a very pleasant time.

The evening was spent in visiting some of the local haunts, and they returned to their hotel, after a day of unbroken enjoyment.

The next day was a restful one, for they had not the least desire to go out. They were content to spend the day in their hotel, and to enjoy the comfort of their rooms.

When evening came, they went to the theatre, as they had promised to do. They were both pleased, and determined to make another visit.
