of the costumer—for once.
First the feminine section of the first night audience was permitted to gasp at the variety of gowns shown during he third act in a Cincinnati department store. Then the masculine portion had a chance to gasp at the possibility that one of the models might shoot the man who had been perfidious to her earlier n her career, and happening upon her again wished to force her to give him another chance to betray her. No, she didn't actually shoot him—the Sir Gala-had and true knight she had discovered in the department store saved her from that. But she came so close to it that it put something like a punch into the play. It gave one rather a history for the leading sylvania, in 1879, he entered the content of the leading financial figures in this city. In dealing with a story of such variety and length, which circled about pany. man seems ikely to send her along the Indiana, the Ohio River and Cincinnati, George V. a reward and a red handkerchief makes her wouldbe captor helpless. Such a result seems inevitable, as doe also the discovery by the playwright that no matter or what general terms he deals with the social problems, he seems bound by theatrical limitations to solve it by some trick, happy ending. Mr. Hobart, in departing widely from the novel in this and other par-ticulars, brings his heroine to a triimphant conclusion. But, then, it's deasing to see sincerity rewarded, even pleasing to see sincerity rewarded, even if it is stagy. The theme is discreetly handled. In fact, the fall occurs with starcely a sound. Episodic as the play is, and questionable though it may be to dramatize a Phillips novel, Mr. Ho-bart probably did all with it that might
