The other day when Peter A. R. Unruh was butchering a beef, the strong wind blew the derrick over, which struck him on the hip, driving one of his teeth entirely through the hip. With so many arrangements to look after concerning Wednesday's wedding nuptials, there was no time to be laid on the shelf for repairs, so Mr. Unruh had to don one of those smiles that won't come off and bear it. He said the way it puffed up after being struck, he was afraid he'd be such a hard looker that he could not be seen at the wedding. It will be remembered that Mr. Unruh was blown from a windmill tower the past summer, so a blow of this kind would be but merely a passing occurrence. The wound is healing nicely.
