

tain, consulting her interests alone pursue a very different course of conduct under this different state of things? Let every gentleman put the question to himself, and the answer of every one would be the same. Why, then, sir, do we not unanimously take the ground here, which if we were called upon to act in an opposite hostile character, would most certainly deter us from persevering in that hostile character against the U. States? Sir, if there had been any doubt upon this subject, our late experience ought to have removed it; for, sir, I have no hesitation in saying, and with pain at heart I shall be compelled to shew it in the course of this debate, that in my judgement, our present embarrassments are too much to be ascribed to our former manifestations of indecision, to our unfortunate dissensions and divisions. Sir! whenever I approach this sorrowful and awful subject, my heart leaps as if it were bleeding at every pore, when I am compelled to reflect, and to believe, that this our beloved and happy country may shortly become a bleeding victim, from wounds—if not inflicted by the hands of her own sons, at least by their unhappy divisions & dissensions. Yes, sir, with a full knowledge of what is past, & strong presages of what is to come—is it not deplorable to be compelled to think, that in a very few months, perhaps in a still shorter time, American blood must be shed, to repel the hostile spirit of Great Britain, now rendered too manifest to every understanding; and worse than all, sir, to wash away the stains of our own unfortunate divisions and dissensions; and is it not wonderful, as it is deplorable, that the virtuous and patriotic American people, and sometimes called the most enlightened in the world, with the experience of the horrible consequences, through all ages, of the divisions of a people amongst themselves, should permit themselves from the same cause to fall a prey to the same inevitable calamities?

Look, Mr. President, through all history from the first dispute between Cain and Abel, down to the late disastrous dissensions between the Spanish branch of the Bourbon dynasty, and find if you can, sir, a single instance of a people who gained any advantage from dissensions amongst themselves, and especially, Sir, when they carried them so far, as to join a foreign against their country's standard! I believe, Sir, not one solitary instance of this kind, stands recorded. Nor is it possible nor practicable in any state of human affairs—because in all cases, the foreign interference in the internal concerns of its neighbors is always for its own and never for its neighbor's benefit. With these monitory lessons before our eyes, and a full conviction of their truth upon our hearts, is it not wonderful, that we should voluntarily give up ourselves victims to the same calamities? But, Sir, gentlemen may ask, where is the remedy? How can we make a sacrifice of our own opinions? Sir! the case is plain one. Let gentlemen exercise their opinions and persevere in their arguments at all times, respecting our internal concerns, as well before as after the measures are adopted; let them, respecting our foreign relations, urge their arguments with a zeal proportioned to the magnitude of the subject; they will be pleasantly received, and respectfully considered; but after the government has taken its attitude against a foreign nation, it would be going too far, to desert its standard, and to join that of the enemy. It is then time for opinion to pause and reflect, whether any consequence can be worse, or more disgraceful, than joining a foreign against its country's standard? Whether it would not be better, more patriotic, more virtuous, to support our country even in a supposed wrong course of policy, than to join a foreign standard, and use it to correct and change the course of policy thus disapproved?

Sir, in a contest between your own and a foreign nation, it never can be wrong to join the standard of your own country; nor right to join the standard of your enemy. Then, sir, here is a rallying point. It is a plain and obvious one. No understanding can mistake it. No heart can disapprove it. It is our own government. Let that be the rallying point. There never can be a more propitious moment than the present for casting into oblivion all for our irritations and dissensions—There can never be a plainer case presented to the human understanding—There never were more urgent considerations in favor of the course recommended—Whether we respect their repulsive effects upon British hostility, or their harmonising effects amongst ourselves, they appear to me to be equally strong a persuasive.—May I not then, sir, indulge the pleasing hope, that the resolution before you will be received as the signal of unanimity in Congress, and joyfully hailed in that character throughout the whole of this great and extended country? Sir, does it not manifest a strange perverseness in the human character, for us to observe that when it is perfectly at our option, we should choose to distress and injure ourselves by irritations and resentments, rather than delight ourselves with union and harmony and mutual good offices?—Especially, sir, when the latter choice would command the respect, if not excite the alarm of our enemy.—For, sir, do you believe that if Great Britain saw the strong arm of this nation stretched out to oppose her unjust spirit of hostility, guided in all its operations by one undivided will, she would so readily encounter its powerful influence, as if she saw it paralysed in all its efforts from the want of an unity of will and action? No, sir, we undervalue our energies and importance, if we were to suppose that her conduct would be the same in both of these situations; or that she is at all indifferent to the course of conduct now to be pursued by us.—Let us then all unite, sir, in this proposition and disapprove her mistaken calculations upon her influence in this country. I verily believe, that union is all that is wanting to appease her hostile spirit towards us. But perhaps, sir, every gentleman present will admit, and it appears to me that no human being can deny, that if the facts stated in the resolution be supported by the correspondence upon which it is founded, that then every gentleman would readily assent to the resolution. But, sir, it is possible, although it appears to be scarcely possible, that some gentlemen may doubt whether the facts stated in the resolution be supported by the correspondence or not. This I admit is a fair, though delicate enquiry, and I will therefore immediately proceed to the examination of that question—and I beg the most critical attention of the Senate in the course of the investigation.

After Mr. Giles concluded, the question was taken on the passage of the resolution to a third reading.—There were 24 members present, besides the President pro tem—of whom 20 voted in favor of it.

It was ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

The bill reported by the same committee to prevent the abuse of the privileges and immunities enjoyed by foreign ministers within the U. States was read.

The question having been put on its passage to a third reading—

Mr. Hillhouse said he could have no objection to the passage of such a bill if he were satisfied of the necessity of it. It was not a novel subject, for it had been agitated three or four years ago in the case of the Spanish minister, & there was a very unanimous opinion in the Senate in favor of such a provision, if it were necessary to carry the object into effect. But the Senate had been informed that the Executive did not think it necessary. Mr. Hillhouse said that he himself had been of the same opinion; he could scarcely suppose that the government would have remained so long without a competent provision to enable the Executive to send away foreign Ministers conducting themselves improperly. He believed for his part that the government had already competent authority to send them away; and as to the means, undoubtedly the proper means were within the direction of the President of the United States, who had the control of the military and naval force. A civil officer could only imprison a person and had no power over him but in his own district; therefore any authority given by the bill to civil officers would be incompetent to the purpose. A marshal could not remove a foreign minister out of the country; for the moment he stepped beyond his jurisdiction his power ceased. Such a service peculiarly belonged to the military and naval force of which the President had already the entire direction. He therefore thought that the passage of this bill, instead of adding to the weight and character of the President, would be declaring that he is not possessed of the power which the constitution has given him. He knew not why this bill should be now introduced. It was in relation to the subject under consideration this morning, he presumed that the President would now as heretofore conceive that he had the power, and wanted no legislative assistance. Mr. H. said he certainly must vote against the bill, unless some necessity were shown for passing it. On the former occasion alluded to (the conduct of d'Yrujo) every one was convinced that the Executive had been insulted, and there was but one sentiment, that if the President had not the power of sending away a foreign minister, he should be invested with it. And yet a bill for giving him that power had been rejected almost unanimously, upon the ground that no legislative provision was necessary; and if he was not much mistaken, information was given to the Senate through those who were in the confidence of the Executive, that he did not want an investiture of the power by Congress; conceiving that he possessed it from a higher source, the constitution of the United States, which authorised him to receive foreign ministers, in which power was included every thing necessary to carry it into execution. Could it have been expected by the framers of the constitution, that, in case of collision with a foreign minister, the President was to wait for the passage of a law by Congress before he could act? This subject had never escaped the attention of Congress; but the President had always been conceived to possess ample power for the purpose contemplated by the bill. If such a provision however were necessary, a law for the purpose ought to have been passed long ago. Under present impressions, Mr. H. said, he should consider this bill as an attempt to express the opinion of Congress, that the President did not possess a power which he believed to be vested in him by the constitution; and therefore he must vote against it.

Mr. Giles said that he did not feel himself at this time qualified to go into any observations on the bill. It certainly was not his wish to press through the Senate a bill without its being well considered, particularly when it involved a constitutional question. He did not know that the President might not have been supposed to possess the power proposed to be given to him by the bill; but he knew very well that the President never had ventured to exercise it. Not wishing to press the bill, he had no objection that it should lie on the table, if any gentleman should think proper to make a motion for that purpose.

Mr. Pope said he had been forcibly struck with the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut, not that he deemed the bill unnecessary, even although the President might already have such a power; for, as so much jealousy existed in this country of Executive power, perhaps Congress should nevertheless express its opinion on this point. He was of opinion also that that part of the bill which related to civil officers should be stricken out. The natural agent of the Executive authority was the naval or military power. To give further time for the consideration of the bill he moved to postpone it till Monday next.

The motion for postponement was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned till Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 8.

A petition from the citizens of Washington praying for a law to make a turnpike road to meet a road about to be constructed in a direct line from Baltimore, was referred to the committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. Morrow reported a bill for extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants; which was twice read and referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Taylor, after a few introductory remarks, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to enquire into the circumstances attending the occurrence alluded to in the letter of Mr. L. A. Coles to the Speaker of this House; that the said committee be instructed to report a statement of the facts with their opinion thereon to this House.

A motion was made by Mr. Stanford to amend the same by striking out the words "committee be appointed" and inserting "the committee appointed to prepare and report such rules and orders as are necessary to be observed in the House be instructed;" which motion was negatived.

The resolution of Mr. Taylor was agreed to, and Messrs. Taylor, Goodwin, Montgomery, Smilie, Pitkin, Taggart and Matthews appointed a committee accordingly.

The letter received a few days ago from Isaac A. Coles, was referred to this committee.

Mr. Sawyer made two unsuccessful attempts to obtain the consideration of a motion made by him a few days ago to erect a separate committee of manufactures.

And the House adjourned till Monday.

LITERATURE.

THOMAS KIRK, of Brooklyn, New York, has now in the press, soon to be published, a curious work, entitled "An Enquiry Concerning the Intellectual and Moral Faculties, and Literature of Negroes," followed by an account of the Life and Works of fifteen negroes, and mulattoes, distinguished in Science, Literature and the Arts. BY H. GREGG, formerly Bishop of Boise, Member of the Conservative Senate, of the National Institute, of the Royal Society of Gortingen, etc. etc. Translated by B. D. WARDEN, Secretary to the American Legation at Paris.

The honorable, though transient allusion to the above work in Mr. Bancroft's letter to Bishop Gregg, has been the cause of bringing it forward in our language. Mr. Kirk having discovered the manuscript copy of Mr. WARDEN'S translation, supposed to have been lost, has purchased it with the copy right; and it is now nearly ready for publication.

From the known spirit of investigation and eminent literary talents of the author, we may expect to find it a useful and instructive book, calculated to remove prejudices against a numerous portion of our fellow creatures, and to throw some additional light on the important physiological question concerning the diversity of men and nations; reconciling the variety of cast and character with the unity of the species.

The second and third resolutions offered by Mr. Brien in the House of Delegates of Maryland have been agreed to; at twelve o'clock tonight the final vote on the whole together was taken and carried in the affirmative, 37 to 5.

By the capitulation of Middleburg the English promised to respect property of all kinds.—As usual, in violation of this they have seized all the Tea, and Spices in the ware-houses of the Dutch East India company, and in those of individuals, and exposed them at public auction. The inhabitants of Walcheren have resolved not to purchase a single article, which standing the high price tea bears in Holland. But one sale has been made. The purchaser is treated with universal disdain, and the English have been obliged to suspend the sales. 100,000 men are said to remain in Austria until a general peace.
