when they wear the leas severe type of clothes, to have the field. Just at present we are in the transition stage. The frock depicted today is evidence enough of this and instead of being rather botchy as a result it is entirely charming. There are ruffies aplenty and a skirt that suggests Bopeep and a daintiness that we have had little to do with within the last few days. But in the plainness and the simplicity of the bodice there are the best features of the Moyen-age type.

It is developed in Georgette, a material that seems to lend itself to any sort of fashion. And the colors are navy blue, and white—which, by the way, is one of the smartest combinations of the moment—every bit as much in fact as black and white and much less usual. The white is used to form the underbodice and the skirt with its rows and rows of ruffes, and the blue is fashioned into the overbodice and the large sash that is tied in the back.
