What Irrigation Has Done in the From the World Today.

Five years ago there was not a home in the Imperial valley of the Colorado desert, There was not even an Indian hogan (earth hut) to shelter the engineers who surveyed the first canals from the Colorado river across the desert. The parched earth was as bare of vegetation as a skating rink, and it seemed even less promising than Death valley, for it lacks the mineral wealth of valley, for it lacks the mineral wealth of that region, the ground being a sedimentary deposit from the Colorado river.

Today a hundred thousand acres are under actual cultivation on the California side of the desert, and ten thousand on the Mexican side. Towns have arisen almost in a night; the principal are Imperial, Holtville, Brawley, Calexico, Mexicali, Heber and Silsbee, ranging from 600 to 1,800 population. There are fifteen thousand people and eleven school districts in the valley. The reports from these school districts for June, 1905, show 701 children, against 370 one year ago. The population of the valley
