

SEVENTY-TON PALM TRANSPLANTED—IT'S GROWING

For many generations this giant palm tree stood in the garden of an old Spanish home in San Diego, Cal. It was growing there long before the civil war was fought. Recently the owner decided that the ancient palm must make room for a modern apartment house. So he sold it to San Diego's 1915 exposition. It was some job digging up this huge tree. But its 70 tons was finally taken to the exposition site and there replanted, and now, after several months, it has started to grow again. It will be an interesting feature of the exposition.

Daughter (singing to her own accompaniment) — I'm afloat; I'm afloat.

Father—You'll jolly soon be capsized by such a squall as that;

Little Jack (who has been told that pussy is thin because she eats flies)—She eats bees, too, mother—I can hear them humming.
