

encouraged and she radiated happiness.

And then several people began intimating that Dolly Stanley was Dolly Silverstein, and when I met her again she had already confessed to this. She, however, had no memory of ever meeting me. Nor did she remember any of the other romance.

But she romanced so far afield that Mrs. Meder suspected she was not even Dolly Silverstein and it was finally discovered that the little orphan girl has a large family who want her to come home.

But Dolly, or Frances, as she is now known, will probably never be able to go back to prosaic small town existence. Her story as Dolly Stanley was taken seriously. It was written up pathetically in one of the papers, accompanied by her portrait, and Frances received three proposals the next day, a letter from a man who enclosed five dollars and unflatteringly stated his opinion of the cruel women who had dealt so heartlessly with their sister-woman, and several dozen positions have been offered to her.

The Catholic Women's Protectorate League will place Frances in a position, since she will not go home, and they will try to exercise care over her future. She is a very sweet little girl and apart from her love of romance is a good worker, and it may be that Frances will not step into the spotlight again.

But this story should convince you that romance exists even in the commonplace lives of working girls.
