"I saw him go. Let me tie your bonnet strings. There," tying them deftly, "now I am sure I hear wheels. I will see you of. Don't remain out after dark, dear."

Her mother laughed as they went together out to where Mr. i.ee was already waiting for his wife at the door, and the farm servant, Jim, was leading around the staid chestnut horse, harnessed to a light buggy. Ble had been speaking to her mother, and speaking to her over her graceful shoulder, as Mrs. Lee bustled about busy with some preparations, while Mattie stood at the window. As her mother finished speaking what we have recorded, a shuffing figure slowly crossed the open space without, going toward the stable. It was not a preposessing figure, and the face above it was simply repulsive. Perhaps its ugliness was greatly due to a great livid scar, which crossed it from temple to chin, going down the cheek, over the lip, terminating below the chin. It always made Mattie shudder to see that horrible scar, and she shivered

Just before the fire of a few years ago it was what would be called a "tumble down affair," but in 1851 it had a somewhat more presentable appearance. This was perhaps due to the neatness and taste of that dapper little mast, Mile. Fierrette, who occupied the premises, rather than its architectural qualities. She went to her room and tried to read, but the thunders, the blinding glares of light, the wild rush of the winds, drew her thoughts constantly from her book. At last, feeling lonely and depressed, and unaccountably alarmed, she left her seat and began walking up and down the room, sobbing like the petted child she was. It was eleven when she at length prepared for bed, extinguished the light, and after a brief prayer, in which she commended her spirit and all she loved to God's care, she lay down, and while the thunders rumbled off in the distance and the winds lost their fierce, hungry, howl, she went off to sleep. Her dreams were not pleasant and from one she started up, cold and shivering and listening for a sound. It always made Mattie shudder to see that borrible scar, and she shivered now, even though the eyes that looked up and met hers for a moment, as the new farm hand passed outside the window, were steady eyes, with light in them that might have glorified another face and lashes drooping over them, long and silken as the lashes of a girl; eyes of deep, dark, mye terious blue, from which that hideous scar took all beauty, in the eyes of the girl, who turned impatiently to her mother.

"You will be back before night, mamma!"

"Yes, Mattie; you may look for us any time after sunset."

ESCAPE OF THE CLIPPER ASTEROID FROM THE PRIVATEER ALABAMA.

1863-A Stern Chase and a Coming Gale-A Summons to Surrender The Escape-"Good-Bye."

Our voyage continued prosperous, and nothing suspicious was discovered until one morning when we were off the cape of Good Hope, as we were sailing along with a fresh breeze right aft, in sight of Table mountain, at the entrance of the harbor of Cape Town, with Cape Leguilas about twenty miles distant on the port bow.

A close lookout was constantly kept, and

A close lookout was constantly kept, and before long, smoke, as if coming from a steamer close under the land, apparently bound to the eastward, was reported. Soon her hull appeared in sight, and by the aid of a glass i made out that she was a low, rakish-looking craft, neither like a man-of-war nor a merchant steamer, but at the distance she was from us it was impossible to tell definitely what she was. Under the circumstances it made me feel very suspicious.

Once she met the father in the alley below the leathedral almost face to face. She hastily drew her viel down and hurried by him while the beguided perewelked on entirely unconstions of the little woman's efforts to hide her face.

Years passed and the trade in altar candles had become one of the recognized industries of that section of the city. Of mornings the neathy-dressed proprietress of the establishment could be seen defuly at work ornamenting those tail ones of wax, putting on here a leaf and there a bit of silvered paper until they grew into gorgeous affairs.

One evening the shutters of the front window, wherein were exposed numbers of these candles, were put up earlier then usual. It was remarked that an old negro woman a performed this labor, and not the lettle Mile.

In a few moments she discovered us, as was evident by her altering her course and attend and the tar visit of attending the American fag. I felt that it must be the famous Alabama, and that we would be safer out of her company. But it was a case of salis and steam combined was closing. What ship is that? could be read. I hoisted the American fag; feeling certain that the steamer's captain would not be deceived in the built and appearance of my vessel any more than I was in his, and, if I was to be taken, I would my my own fag to the lettle Mile.

with us to prevent further risk of their lives. Fortunately I had good officers on whom I could rely. I ordered them to get their revolvers, and told the steward to get mine. Then, mustering the crew on the quarter-deck, I told them they were enthe quarter-deck, I told them they were engaged in a seriou; mutiny, and the first man who refused duty or attempted to interfere with the orders of my officers would be shot on the spot. They realized the situation and promised obedience.

Half the afternoon was gone. The see toofed cottages are buried, the only means by which the air can reach the interior being down the single chimney, which in all the cottages is built very wide and substantial.

The steamer followed my example, both vessels rushing through the water at their highest rate of speed, and both down the single chimney.
