Speeding Right Ahead!

Why is it that this store is crowded day after day while other stores are deserted and complaining about business? You can easily tell. It is because we offer superior merchandise at right prices.

Our advertising is under a severe censure, and no exaggerated statements are allowed. We would rather have you come here and find the values better than advertised than to paint our advertising in glowing language and disappoint you when you get here.

Here is this week's list of tion as a stepping-stone to an artistic career with brush or chisel.

One man is responsible more than anybody or anything else for this change in character of the model from the demi-mondaine to the refined woman. When Charles Dana Gibson created the Gibson Girl he created a demand for a type of face and figure that showed above all things refinement and character.

Artistic in design—durable in construction—finished in the best possible manner, front legs terminated in a graceful carved paw, strongly castored, 26x33 shaped, French plate beveled mirror, top drawer extends full width, with double sweep, and is sub-divided inside—the two other drawers are spacious and void of curves, making a pleasing contrast to the one above; all any of the drawers to its utmost capacity, and it may be opened or closed as easily as if empty.

Chiffonier to match, $25.00. Cheval Dresser to match, 26.00. Same pieces cost but a dollar or two more in mahogany.

RETURN OF THE WILD PIGEONS.

Expected by Pennsylvanians, Now That Wild Turtle Doves Have Come.

For the first time in many years the shooting of wild turtle doves is allowed, and this bird, once thought to be almost extinct, is now so plentiful that big bags are being secured by hunters.

Kistler's Valley years ago was famous as the roosting and breeding place of thousands of wild pigeons, and there are still some of the older people left who can tell stirring tales of the countless thousands of wild pigeons that obscured the sun in their flight, and when they alighted in a forest crash upon crash was heard as branches broke under their weight.

The slaughter was proportionate to the density of the roost. There was no sport connected with it; it was simply slaughter. One could knock them over by the hundreds by merely using a pole. Many killed for the sake of wanton killing, and thousands of the birds were left to rot on the ground.

Wild pigeons formed the staple meat food for hundreds of families throughout the winter. They were killed and salted down. One could buy two dozen pigeons for 5 cents or less. In spite of the immense slaughter, it had no appreciable effect in reducing their number. Each spring the people would hear a peculiar booming, whirring sound, and on looking up they would see cloud after cloud of pigeons sweeping up from the southern horizon and seeking their old roosting place. For miles around the news would spread, nearly as fast as the flocks, that "the pigeons are coming," and preparations for the slaughter would be made.

One year the people looked in vain for the annual food supply of pigeons. They never came again, and although over half a century has come and gone, this tragic mystery in the feathered kingdom has never been solved. To this day no one knows what swept away in one season millions of wild pigeons.

In this connection a curious prophecy is remembered. Years ago an old man said: "When once again the wild turtle dove is shot in Lehigh County then look for the return of the wild pigeons, but not before."

It is a strange commentary upon the above that within the past year more than one hunter has reported seeing small flocks of wild pigeons in this country, but so swift on the wing and so shy were they that no shots could be made effective.

That the turtle dove is the avian courier of the wild pigeon is believed by many an old hunter—Kistler's Val-Record.

UPLIFTING THE MODERN TRILBY.

Those who suppose that an artist's model is a passive creation of pose, not over-respectable, to be found in maximum numbers at minimum prices, are as badly mistaken as newspapers and Bohemian fiction can well make them. From the time and environment of Trilby in the Latin Quarter to the Gibson Girl and Phoebe Snow in New York is a far cry, and about the only thing they have in common is that they furnish motives for artists to put pigments on canvas.

Nowadays the model is a special artist in a special profession; she is a girl with a wholesome and whole-hearted pride in her work; she has a name which she jealously guards, and while not likely to compete with millionaires in rearing gargoyle places on Fifth Avenue, she is independent and able to live in the cosiest of apartments. In Paris, the model is the synonym of the demi-mondaine. Not so in New York. Here she is a girl who is earning her own living or doing the work for work's sake. Often she is posing because she thinks she is beautiful, or her friends have told her so, and cases are known where members of the fashionable world have consented to lend their charms to illustrations for books that for months were rated among the 10 best sellers. More than likely, however, the model is not already independent, but is working her way unaided, using her occupa-
