Mether and children—Wilbe, aged 10, and Kaite, 8—met the sorrowful proces-sion at the door and gave way to a grief which caused tender tears of sympathy o flow from the eyes of all present Yes, the Fourth of July had come again, and the bitter memories of the last independence Day came forcitly and panifully to Widow Ellington and opened atrests the wound that generous-hearted time had Her sad, heart-aching retrospections ere not her only troubles. Her husband was a poor man, dependent upon his daily labor for their support, and since his death she had had a hard struggle to keep the wolf from the door. Often had she denied herself food, that the hunger of her children might be appeased. And this anniversary of our glorious independence, and of her bushand's death, found her larder empty and the last cent gone. Over on the common somethirty or forcy boys had assembled to consider in what manner they should celebrate the great est of all our national holidays, There was no need to buy powder for the can oou, for there was already subscribed more money than was necessary for that purpose. There was going to be speaking and a big dinner, as usual, but the boys wanted something more. One of themproposed that they borrow the blacksmith's anvils and make their own noise. Another suggested that they put their money gether and have a pyrotechnic display that pight. Finally a boy, a hardsome bobest, serious brown eyes, mounted a stump and said: "Boys, I will tell you how we can make this the happiest Fourth of July we have How? How?" eried a dozen or more of his companions, in unason. "You know," went on Hal Reed, the speaker, "that on the last Fourth poor Tom Ellington was killed. This is a said Fourth of July for his widow. My mother who gives her sewing and helps her in other ways, says that often she has not enough for her children to cat.
