[From the New York World.] Mr. Sweeny's Resignation of his Office, and Retirement From Politics.

It may surprise the public, but will surprise nobody to whom Mr. Sweeny has been in the habit of talking for the last six or eight months, to learn, as they will by his letter to Mayor Hall in all the journals to-day, that he has resigned his office, and taken a final leave of politics. When Tammany thus loses its brains, there is nothing left of the organization which will not putrify and go to decay. Shakspeare says in "Macbeth!"

"The times have been, That, when the brains were out, the man would And there an end."

By the retirement of Mr. Sweeney, Tammany becomes a carcass which, having lost its brains, is destined to spee dy dissolution Tweed's election as Senator is a vain triumph; he is a stout, gross man, who has thews and sinews without much intellect; and though his constituents can bear him to the doors of the Senate, they will be unable to secure his admission.

Mr. Sweeney, on the contrary, receiving his whole political education in this bad school, has constantly risen above its sordid atmosphere. He reminds one of this passage of Milton, describing the creation:

"Now half appeared The tawny lion, pawing to get free His hinder parts."

There is nothing in this man of the taw-dry display which has been noticed in other members of the Ring. No prominent Democrat of this State, not even Silas Wright, ever practiced a more truly republican simplicity in his modes of life. Though possessing a social and genial nature and great amiability, he declines invitations on all festive and ceremonious occasions, and lives with great plainness in his own home. No man ever kept more fastidiously aloof from every sort of social ostentation, and few men have a more controlling sense of fidelity to friends—this last virtue being, in his case, almost a vice, considering who some of his friends have been. If his associations had only been different, it would be a pity to lose such a man from public life; but like poor Tray in the fable, he suffers from having been found in bad
