Mr. Daniel was interrupted by Mr. Douglas, who called his attention to the provision of the constitution requiring the capitation tax to be applied to school purposes. In reply to Mr. Douglas, Mr. Daniel had no objections to the education of the colored children, but he did not want it done at the expense of the honor of the State. Let the schools go, let education stop, but pay the debt of the State lirst. Mr. Daviel looked upon the proposition to Mr. Daniel looked upon the proposition to reduce the mileage and pay of members, as an affair for buncombe, a small affair, &c. As his Excellency recommended one of these propositions, one of his shining lights can't see it as his Excellency does. He intended voting against all such things, but would suggest that the sessions of the present body be made shorter; that the members rise early and work late. Very sensible in Mr. Daniel; let us see who will adont his views. He did not believe will adopt his views. He did not believe the State tax was as burdensome upon the people as were those imposed by the Radiical constitution, as county tax, to pay the great retinue of officers made necessary by the presente onstitution. He would have attempted it before now but for the kind of people there were in power at Washington. He intended becoming a personally in favor of Republican institutions, expresses the belief that nstitutions, expresses the belief that immediate establishment of a Republic, which, he thinks, would be to the advantage of the people generally; since the moneyed classes have become almost insupportable in the haughtiness of their character and bearing. To their purse-proud behavior he attributes much of the bitterness and ill feeling which exist between the upper and lower ranks of society. He states as his belief that the formation of a republic would not create any perceptible reaction in affairs, but that, when the nine days excitement was over, business would continue as before, without any interruption whelver. The immediate effect of the death of the Prince upon the New York immediate establishment of a Republic, the death of the Prince upon the New York money market would of course be to send gold up considerably, while paper money would slightly decrease in value, but he holds that the event would in no wise disturb the sellicoleration. in no wise disturb the political or commercial relations of the United States and Great Britain. On the contrary, he believes that the similarity of institutions lieves that the similarity of institutions which would then ensue would strengthen the bond of union already existing between the two countries. Per contra, the British Consul does not anticipate any change in the form of government as the result of the Prince's death, except, possibly, the establishment of a regency; the government having, he states, taken ample precautionary measures in case of any misunderstanding between the people and their rulers.—Pittsburg Commercial.

EMILIO CASTELAR, the great Spanish orator, has defended the "International" Spanish Cortes. The government in the having been asked to put the society down, Castelar resisted the motion with vehement eloquence, proclaimed the advent of the people and working classes to public life, and asserted that a Republic was inevitable speech: I ask and demand from the most ardu ous and enthusiastic portion of my party, who, measuring the generous patience of the people by their own generous impatience, believe they can engender with one word a revolution, and with a revolution can change the inertness of human society, that they will remember society only marches forward when in addition to the ciety, that they will remember society only marches forward when, in addition to the impulse of many and oft-repeated efforts, it receives the steam of many and very powerful ideas. I am about, gentlemen, to reveal to you the bottom of my heart and conscience; the whole secret of my politics. I believe that which has conquered the ancient powers, transformed the present generations, broken the Cæsarism which was the keystone of European reaction, destroyed the temporal authority of the Pope, which was as the last shadow of the Middle Ages in our horizon which has dissolved the ancient Austria, the nucleus of the Holy Alliance of monarchs, and which is every ly Alliance of monarchs, and which is every day more lively and more living—the ideal of youthful America before the eyes of the les-that which nothing can impedenothing, however strong it may appear-the proximate advent of all Europe to the idea and the social formula we pant for— the proximate advent of federation and of the Republic. (Cries of "No, no," min-gled with cheers from the left.) The question is one of time only. Time will show whether my affirmation or your denial is right. Faith in the progress of humanity and a continuous study of history inspire within me unalterable confidence in the proximate fulfillment of my assertion,

The country will be relieved to learn that four of the principal topics which engage public attention, namely, the Tariff, Internal Taxation, Civil Rights, and Civil Service Reform, are likely to receive immediate consideration in Congress. Let us have no more threatening awful things about the Tariff, but have done with what is to be done, and relieve the commercial as witness in their own cases, so as to permit the evidence of the parties themselves to be given by deposition in all cases where the depositions of other witnesses are allowed to be read in evidence under the ato the expediency of relieving members of volunteer companies from service as arors.

By Mr. Kirkpatrick—To enquire into the expediency of so amending section 50 of the act approved May 11th, 1870, as to dispense with the useless expense of publishing the certificates of election therein referred to.

There are various schemes involving a more complete defense of Civil Rights under consideration; but if any Congressman can show us how to get rid of martial law in the South, and soon, without abandoning the people to self-destruction, we hope he will do it, and will receive instant attention from his fellow-legislators.
