WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Woodrow Wilson today sent to Congress in a special message an act relating to the establishment of a peacemaking commission, which he described as a "blockade of the war spirit." The act, which he referred to as the "peace league," provides for the appointment of a commission of five members, three of whom shall be resident in Europe and two in the United States. The commission is authorized to make recommendations to the president for the prosecution of the war on the basis of the principles of the United States, and to make such recommendations to the president as may be necessary for the prosecution of the war on the basis of the principles of the United States.

The commission is empowered to receive information from any source, including the president, the secretary of war, the secretary of the navy, the secretary of the treasury, and the secretary of agriculture, in order to enable it to discharge its duties. The commission is also empowered to make recommendations to the president for the prosecution of the war on the basis of the principles of the United States, and to make such recommendations to the president as may be necessary for the prosecution of the war on the basis of the principles of the United States.
