AT WHIST.

Across the polished table there I see her sitting now; her hair, Her eyes, her dainty fingers, too, Just as in years agone I knew, My partner.

I led a heart—I think the king— It passed around the silent ring And, though it was the best one out, She paused a moment, half in doubt, Then trumped it.

"Oh. partner, that was the command."
She said, when she had played the band,
Then, wrinkling up her pretty brow,
"You will forgive me won't you now,
For trumping?"

Another night, remembered well, She sat where moon-cast shadows fell, No polished table lay between; The tree-boughs made a waving screen

Above her. We talked of other things than whist, I strove her fancy to enlist With all a lover's gentle art. Yet once again I beld my heart Unguarded.

I led my heart again, my last, When round to her the trick had passed She thought it not the best one out, So, paused a moment, half in doubt, Then trumped it.

This time no pleading glance I caught, No trembling lips forgiveness sought, No eyes with lashes drooping wet Told me my partner did regret To trump it.
