British Mistakes about the Procla-

Among the American diplomatic papers in the British "Blue Book," just printed, is a note from Earl Russel (the British foreign minister) to Lord Lyons, dated January 17th, which is remarkable for a mizapprehension of the nature of the President's proclamation and the reasons for it, so complete and inexcusable as to make it appear like a perverse misrepresentation of the measure. Earl Russell begins by declaring the proclamation "of a very strange nature," and he proceeds to show in what respects be considers it strange. It professes, he says, to emancipate the slaves where the United States has no jurisdiction and can exercise no authority, but leaves the negroes still slaves in the districts occupied by federal troops, where emancipation might be carried into effect. The minister must have got this idea from hostile criticisms of the proclamation. If he had read the document he would have seen that it makes no such distinction. It declares emancipation in the States and parts of States that had persisted in rebellion up to the first of January, and exempts the States and part of States where the authority of the Government had been re-es tablished and acknowledged, at least nominally. Earl Russel proceeds further to criticise:-

"There seems to be no declaration of a principle adverse to slavery in this proclamation. It is a measure of war, and a measure of war of a very questionable kind. As President Lincoln has twice appealed to the judgment of mankind in his proclams. tion, I venture to say I do not think it can or ought to satisfy the friends of abolition, who look for total and impartial freedom for the slave, and not for vengeance on the slave owner.

This is a disbonest and paltry trick of words, and discourtesus at that. "Vengrance on the slave owner" is neither expressed nor implied in the proclamation, as Earl Russel should have known. Nor was it the object of the proclamation "to satisfy the friends of abolition." The proclamation was not issued by the President of the abolition society but by the President of the United States, as Commanderin-Chief of the army. It was a war measure, and there was no occasion to declare in it principles adverse to slavery. Any such declaration would have put the measure upon a false and indefensible basis; and exposed it to real objection. A single hour of honest study of the relations of our State and National governments would show Earl Russel that the general government has no control of slavery, and that it would be a usurpation for the President to touch it except by act of war and for military reasons. It follows of course that he cannot abolish slavery in a loyal district or State, unless he can make it an pear that its destruction there is needful to the success of his armies in the insurgent section. The most clamorous abolitionist has never undertaken to show this

It is provoking to see such entire misrepresentation of our affairs from the authorized mouthniese of the British government, takes them off by families, and we can't ized mouthpiece of the British government. Did Earl Russell write this note for effect at home? And was it his aim merely to neutralize the rising sympathy with our cause produced by the emancipation measure? It looks like it. And it shows that the highest members of the British over us so, is borrid. government are not above the small tricks

That was unkind on the part of Russell. It almost insinuates an imputation on Maon's personal veracity.

February 27, 1863, Russell acknowledged another ponderous letter from Mason, and cartly replied:

"I have already, in my previous letters. fully explained to you the views of her Ma Pesty's Government on this matter, I have nothing further to add in reply to your last letter, except to observe that I have not intended to state that any number of vessels of a certain build or tonage might be left at liberty freely to enter a blockaded port without vitiating the blockade; but the oc-casional escape of small vessels on dark nights, or other particular circumstances. from the vigilance of a competent blockading fleet, did not evince that laxity in the bel gerent which inured, according to international law, to the raising of a blockade.

A Rebel Letter.

The enclosed letter was captured in a ebel mail near Winchester the other day by one of our boys and handed to us by a friend for publication. Longwood, the place where the letter is dated, is a farm near Winchester. The information contained is quite interesting as adding confirmation to the reports already received and the War Department, to send to our assistance against the Yankees. If help don't come soon we will be entirely ruined. The people of Winchester are in a deploration. A negro went to the hall the other day, and took his wife and children, and then to the smoke house and got meat to support them, and this thing happens somewhere every day. There will be no labor, horse, or man, left us soon to cultivate the land, and the villains riding all

The force in Winchester has been estimated at from three to five thousand-not much over the former I expect. What there cept one small precinct, which will increase is at Martinsburg and Harper's Ferry I do not know. I am told they are trying to organize a negro regiment in Winchester .- We cannot think the authorities know the condition of things up here.
