Make it Plain.

People do not always take pain enough when instructing children in religious matters to see that they understand what is taught; consequently a child will often get entirely mistaken ideas in regard to important things, and very queer ones, too, sometimes, as the following true incidents will show. A little girl had been taught that when good people died their bodies were buried in the ground, but their souls were taken to heaven; and not knowing that one's soul is one's self, imagined that the souls in heaven were little round things about the size of a watch crystal, and the color of a white porcelain button, ranged in rows on shelves like the plates in her mother's pantry. A Sunday school teacher in talking to her class of little girls used the word dogma, and probably all that she said showed equal wisdom, for one child, struck by the word as a pretty sound-ing one and one she had never heard before, and getting no idea of its mean-ing from the connection in which it was used, thought it must mean a lit-
