

U. S. TEMPORARY HOME
OF GREEKS—CONSTANTINE

Athens, Sept. 10.—The king of the Greeks received the Associated Press correspondent at the Chateau of Dekeleia, the summer residence of the royal family at Tatoi, some 16 miles northeast of Athens, this noon.

Constantine I. is just turned 47, an affable, pleasant looking, one-mannered gentleman whose principal business is that of a soldier, albeit he doesn't look it. Creating a capable Greek army has been the work of his life. He studied in the war college in Berlin where he became thoroughly trained in Prussian theory of modern warfare. As a soldier who has won his armies to two victories, Constantine I. is immensely popular with his countrymen.

Straight away the king plunged into the subject of the war. With unquestioning confidence in the correspondent's pledge not to quote him he expressed his views with the utmost frankness; he followed with special interest the campaign in Russia.

Slowly the talk veered to the Greeks everywhere. He felt himself king of the Greeks whether they be in Greece or not. It was thus that he came to speak of the Greeks in the United States and to permit the Associated Press to print his views on the subject of Greek emigration.

"For you see," said the king, "the question of Greek emigration to the United States is a most important one. There are something over 300,000 Greeks in your country. But it is in great measure a temporary population; before the Balkan wars there were probably even more Greeks in America. At that time something like 45,000 returned to Greece to fight. I believe that if the occasion were to arise again, as many would again return for the same purpose.

"Since then, however, many of the Greeks who came home at that time have gone back to America. But this time the emigration has been with a signal difference. At the first emigration the men went alone. Their idea was to make a modest fortune, return to their families in Greece, buy a little farm or a shop in one of the cities and live in comfort to the end of their days.

"But a great many of those who returned to America after a first trial and after they had served their country in the Balkan wars, took their families with them. For them it was no longer an experiment. So when they sailed for the west the second time as prospective Americans, almost all of them quit their mother country forever.

"And I cannot believe that this is or has proved an unmixed good. Greece is not over-populated. In going to America the emigrant Greek runs very considerable risks over which he himself as a Greek has little or no control. Just the other day a trans-Atlantic Greek liner brought back to Greece more than 1,000 Greeks who had embarked in New York. This is happening constantly these days. On account of the war, industrial conditions in the United States would seem to be inferior to industrial conditions in Greece. At home the Greek finds that he is proportionately more prosperous than in America. But he has lost something in making the double voyage.

"The loss is a serious one. It reveals a serious problem. This matter of Greek emigration to the United States is a problem which Greece must have time and calm in which to reach a proper solution."
