A LOST BRITISH ISLE.

Now omes the twenty-fifth unniver-sary of England's cession of Heligofind to formany. But England isn't celebrating the event. On the con-trary. Englishmen are repenting in anciciota and naives the exclusive of that rocky island for Zanzibar off the count of Africa.

Of course, when that trade was made neither England nor Germany ferresaw the value of Heligotand as a hazal base in such a war as they are now entaged in. Curiously enough many Germans at that time viewed the trade with indifference, while ome short-muitted Englishmen com olimented themselves on the trade What wouldn't England give for Hellgoland, a veritable Gibraltur. This triangular shaped Island, with solid lifts of granite, fairly bristles with guns of the most powerful caliber. In fact, the island is so strongly fortified that Germany believes it is absolutely impregnable. They would even match B against Gibraltar,

But its greatest value to Germany is the protection it affords for the Gerfor aeronautic and other operations from the coast. There are how two islands, though originally one. In 1270 an eruption of the sea cut Heli-maland in two. The larger portion is known as Ro k island, with Dunen toset a marrier mile to the east. Du nen-inset has a magnificent barbon deep enough to take the hugen bat-rieships. Then there are bases for submarines on top of Rock island are sheds for Zeppelins and airships. Denmark but in 1887 the island were selled by the British and ceded to England in 1814. It was in 1890 that the British made their unfortunote trade with Germany,

Today Englishmen are reflecting anon what would have happened had they retained Heligound. The double island is situated only twenty-seven miles from the Gorman mainland and commands the mouth of the Pibe and Weser rivers.
