ALEXANDRIA GAZETTE.

From the London Courier.
The Duke de Reichstadt has fallen a victim to pulmonary disease brought on by a rigid system of confinement, and denial of all those innocent pleasures in which youth delights to indulge. As the political existence of the young Napoleon was considered incompatible with the despotism of the rulers who by their triumph over his father obtained the custody of his person, it was resolved to withhold from him every chance of mixing with the world, and of forming a rallying point for those, who although they had been disgusted with the father for his departure from free principles, remembered with delight the brilliancy of his military career, and were willing to try the effect of the name borne by the son. On the part of the three Sovereigns alluded to there never was, we are sure, the least intention of destroying the life of the young Napoleon. They would indeed have been horror-struck at the imputation of such a motive; but the effect of their conduct towards him has been as fatal as if their enemy to the name of Napoleon had been as fixed as their determination to prevent the possibility of his becoming a rallying point for the liberals of every Continental State. There were besides it we have not been misinformed, persons having control over the actions of the young Prince who were anxious to show their zeal for the enemies of the name which he bore, to an extent far beyond the wishes of the Holy Alliance, and decidedly in opposition to those of his grandfather, by whom he was tenderly beloved.
At a time when his removal to a milder climate, as the only chance of arresting the progress of the disease, was recommended by his physicians, and earnestly desired by the Emperor, he is said—by the influence of those means which every faction behind a throne possesses of overpowering the throne itself—to have been detained in Vienna during one of the coldest winters of that capital, in which the winters are at all times trying to an extraordinary degree. Even six months ago, when we first announced the dangerous illness of the young Duke, one of his confidential attendants stated, on the authority of a medical friend who thoroughly understood the disease, that with the use of proper means there was still a chance of saving his life.
We have now before us an extract of a letter addressed by this gentleman to an Austrian of high rank here. He says—"I despair of our excellent young friend with the treatment which is now observed towards him. The poor boy is absolutely wretched in mind, and without relaxation he must soon die. Where he engaged in some active pursuit there would still be a chance. He is pining to death." The loss of this Prince is of little importance in a political sense. Had he lived and been permitted to enjoy the freedom which belonged to him of right, he could not have disturbed the peace of Europe for the Napoleon party has now little influence even in France. The manner of his death, however, must give pain to every person whose heart has not been steeled by some fancied political interest against the emotions which naturally affect mankind. We do not envy the feelings of those by whose management he was destroyed, if indeed such men have any feelings left. The Augsburg Gazette, in true country style, tells us that "preparations were made immediately for the departure of his disconsolate mother for her Duchy, in order not to endanger her own life." This is the first time we have heard that the ex-Empress was possessed of such an extraordinary affection for the child of the man whom she abandoned in such an indecent haste, and for whose life she so soon consoled herself, by an arrangement of which the scandal-mongers of Germany have said perhaps too much, but the notoriety of which was too great even for denial by her friends.
"This 'disconsolate mother' was, we remember, once spoken of as the disconsolate wife, and yet we do not find that she ever exerted herself to prevent the banishment of her husband, or exhibited towards him any mark of affection when confined to a spot which proved destructive to his life. Neither have we heard that she ever interposed to entreat for that indulgence from the gaolers of her son which might have checked the disease by which he has been destroyed. Had the Augsburg Gazette told us of the disconsolate Emperor, instead of disconsolate mother, we should have attached more respect to the term; for it is well known that this amiable sovereign was devotedly attached to his grandson, and most anxious to preserve his life. Of the character of young Napoleon we know but little. Those who had opportunities of seeing and conversing with him, speak of him in the most glowing terms, and we are disposed to credit all they say. His character, however, could hardly have developed itself. The atmosphere of a Court is not calculated to give expansion to the mind, and in the instance of this prince it must have been more than usually prejudicial to mental as well as physical growth.
Both the French and German papers mention, with becoming regret, the early decease of the only legitimate child of the Emperor Napoleon. The illness of the young Prince had long ago given rise to rumors, which the accounts of his death will be adduced to confirm—namely, that he has been carried off by poison. With the inventors or propagators of such criminal absurdities, with persons who believed that his father and the late Queen of England were poisoned by the English Ministry of the day—it would be almost ridiculous to reason; but we would only ask the better part of the public to consider what motive could exist in the Austrian Court for the commission of such a crime?
The Emperor of Austria and his wily councillor, Metternich, were perfectly aware of the great stake which they held in their hand by the possession of a Napoleon in any game which they might wish to play against France. They had endeavored to give him a German education, but they knew that he might easily pretend to have a French heart; they kept him away from Italy, but they were fully aware that the influence of his father's name and glory might still be equivalent to an army against the Orleans successors of the Bourbons. Even in the late negotiations respecting the Austrian interference in the Roman legations, the important hostage at Schœnbrunn was not forgotten by either party, as a pledge of peace or an instrument of hostility. On the score of interest, therefore, the Austrian dynasty must have been desirous of rearing the young lion of their house, whose ambition at home they felt assured of being able to tame or muzzle; but motives of a more pure and effeminate kind were not wanting to secure their utmost efforts for his preservation.
The young Prince was not only possessed of some of the intellectual talents of his illustrious father, but evinced very early the most amiable disposition and the most generous temper. He was particularly beloved by his Imperial grandfather, and though the family is great and not very united, he was the general favorite. The real cause of his death, therefore, was neither poison nor harsh treatment, but a malady which no family kindness could avert, nor any resource of the healing art remove. He has left behind him sincere sorrow for his untimely death if not enlightened regrets for the failure of the liberal anticipations attached to his name by the friends of Italian, perhaps of French independence. Upon the whole, it is better that the poor boy should have died.

Fishermen Look Here!
I WILL lease, for a number of years, my Point Landing, to a good tenant, and as my object is to obtain the profits for manner, more than to profit by the rent, I offer it for only the necessary fish for my family's use and for all the officials. It has always been considered one of the best Herring Landings, and by removing a hang in the upper part of the berth, which will not cost more than from $100 to $200, it will be equal to any other in the vicinity as a Shad Fishery. It is only 16 miles below Alexandria, D. C.
For its character and advantages I refer to Capt. Jas. Hollis, near Harris' Lot, Charles County, Maryland, one of the most respectable and experienced fishermen upon the Potomac, who has known it for fifteen years; also to Mr. Alonso Hollis, Abingdon, Harford County, Maryland, who has fished it with his father.
