A VENETIAN LOVE SCENE. Sweet solemn Venice! o'er thee lade Ere's late-t hnes of glory, While by you shadowy colonnade Year Balbi's palace hoary, wouth, with passion kindled lip, And Taste's har Jonious hand, Must still devoted vigil keep, invoking Beauty bland.

Appear, my lady-love, appear --Look from the latticed bower, An! bless his sight who watches here The livelong twilight hour. The stars are out, and why shouldst thou, My preriess One, delay To fish upon me from thy brow

A far diviner ray? But others gaze upon thee now, And drink thy glorious smile, And make thy spirit mindless how Mine maddens here the while. Ab treaat, why should their dull praise My secret hour consume? Look forth, and with one gracious gaza, Make gladness of my gloom.

"Lo! jealous eye and ear are far, And last the evening flies; Then laiter not, thou lovely star-Young moon of beauty rise! Or is thy faith, like flower spray, broke,

God! that leaving start! Keen sudden, home: the poinard's stroke Has split his very hear !

While on the air his song yet gusles, Life's stiff of fountain stops; Dead on the rebeck that he crushes, The young Battista drops. Andere his murd-rer's skulking shade His ell the moonbeam bare, Damp in the soiling dust are laid Those curls of chesnut hair. Forth from her bow'r the maiden wended

At love's victorious call, Where broad the marble steps descended Upon the blue canal; A sadden brightness with her bringing, As though from out the main his light the vanish d day was flinging Through suaset's gate again.

By vonder shaft he leans to hide, The proud impatient boyl'a steal upon his song!" she cried, la girlhood's resy joy. And gla cing on like cushat fleet, She gained the sad moonshine; By Heaven she stumbles! and her feet Are plashing-not in wine. Oce look-but come-we'll leave be
