GRANDMA'S ROMANCE.	LOU T. MILES.
--------------------	---------------

The loud ringing of a bell called me from a melancholy meditation, one gloomy morning in April. I had been sitting for some time in my room dreaming of days gone by, when I had been a happy child, a gay maiden and a happy bride.

But those days were gone to come back to me never more. I thought of a bright-eyed boy who had played about my knee in those remembered days, whose prattle and laugh were to me my world. Outside of the pleasant hours I passed with my beautiful boy my time was occupied by keeping my husband's accounts. I go back now to the last time I went to his desk.

It had been my custom to go to the desk about ten in the morning. On this particular morning I had gone to the desk as usual, taking care to see that baby was comfortable before I left him. As I entered the office I noticed nothing out of place or disarranged in any way. I had only set a few moments at the desk when I felt or heard a strange awful noise, a horrible burning in my head, and I remembered no more.

Three weeks from that day I awoke to find that I was deaf and dumb and that my baby and my husband were missing. I was able to walk about the room and pick up here and there a broken toy or some little trinket which had been my darling's.

My nurse and physician wrote on a slate and told me I had had a narrow escape from death, that I had been shot in the head, and that it was quite probable that I would never hear nor speak again. My first question was to ask where the baby was, and my husband. I saw the doctor and nurse exchange glances and by the movement of their lips I could tell they were consulting each other. I would have given the world had I possessed it to have spoken to them or to have heard their conversation. But speech and hearing were denied me and I wrote on the little slate:

"Tell me where my darling is or I shall go mad." I felt myself grow weak and dizzy as the doctor handled me the slate and I trembled so I could hardly hold it as I read: "Your husband is dead, your baby is in Heaven." My sight failed, I felt nothing but a keen pain at my heart and I knew no more.

When I awoke they told me it had been six months since I had been recognized a friend. Yet, strange to say, I remembered very distinctly the day I had felt in a dead swoon on hearing of my great misfortune. I grew strong and began to walk about the place as I had long ago. But my heart seemed to be frozen. Nothing thrilled or cheered me, I was totally insensible to the beauties of my home and its surroundings. I wandered aimlessly about, thinking of nothing but my boy and papa. One day it suddenly dawned upon my mind that they had never told me anything concerning the death of my husband or baby. I walked into the house and into the room, where my old nurse sat in the corner by the fire. I wrote on my little tablet and asked her to tell me the whole thing concerning the death of my husband and child. She first looked at me as though she was trying to frame some excuse, but I wrote emphatically: "You must tell me now," and handed her my tablets and pencil. She wrote: "Your husband shot you and then shot himself, your baby we suppose is dead, but he was stolen first; I can tell you nothing more." As I read the terrible words my blood seemed to freeze, then grow hot with rage. Who had dared to be so cruel as to steal my baby? Why was it my husband sought my life and his own? I would no longer live an aimless life, but would spend my time in the future in searching for my babe. I signed to the nurse to leave the room. I wished to be alone. Nervously I paced the floor, pressing my hands to my bewildered brain and trying to invent some plan by which I might go to work to find my baby. I sent for Dr. Smith and told him my intentions. He handed me an old paper and showed me the notice of the death of a little child:

"Died—On the fifteenth of April, 1880, Byrd Leslie, aged 12 months."

The notice of the death of my own little darling, but I did not believe it. Something seemed to tell me that that notion was a fraud, and that my little boy lived and that I should find him. I began to lay my plans. I went first to my husband's desk and examined everything carefully. I tried to recall everything that passed between my husband and myself previous to going into the office room. I could not remember that he had looked in the least out of humor or excited.

My eyes wandered about the room when suddenly I saw the corner of an envelope peeping from beneath the carpet. I sprang to snatch it out, when a picture fell from it, then I noticed a letter inside. I took it out, unfolded it and read a letter in a delicate feminine hand. It ran:

"My Dearest Paul—
"This is probably the last time you will ever hear of me. I write to say, goodbye. Why is it we have to live separated? You don't love her, she is not yours, nor never will be. I alone am the one to love you and make you happy. But as you still cling to her on account of the boy, I must bid you goodbye, my darling, tho' it breaks my heart. Should anything ever happen to you or to her I shall have your little child.
"I sail tomorrow for London. Farewell.
ANNA."

My fingers dropped the paper as though it had burnt them. Great God! My husband false to me, and I be so blind. I picked up the picture, Oh! such eyes, such lips, such hair, my eyes never saw a fairer face. Had that beautiful viper taken my little child, and had she put the cruel sea between our faces? The thought was maddening. I should go to London. I called my nurse and informed her that I was going to take a trip to London and she would begin packing at once.

In a few weeks I was snugly fitted up in a little room in London. I went out every day, I went everywhere. I was looking for a face, one I knew nothing could erase from my memory. One day I was visiting an Art Gallery, and in looking over the pictures I recognized the face of my dear little boy. Oh! Joy beyond measure, he lived and I should again feel his little arms encircle my neck. I made inquiries as to whose child he was and the students told me he was the child of a wealthy widow living in London. Could they give me her name? No, but the lady would be at the place on Wednesday at two o'clock, if I would call I could have the pleasure of seeing her. I replied that I should call. I drove back to my rooms and sat down to think over the past events. Could I but find my boy and get my speech and hearing. The latter seemed hopeless. While the tears trickled down my cheeks and I mourned for my lost love and the days of happiness that I knew were lost forever, and the crushed leaves of a mistaken trust were lying dreamlessly over a heart that was broken. Ah! What was that? A sound? Yes, my reverie was broken by a dim clamorous noise. Yes. Oh Joy! it was really the sound of a bell and no dream. A loud noisy bell. I stood up half paralyzed with hope and fear. The door burst open and Anna rushed in frantically, grabbing me around the waist and jerking me out of the room and gasping "Fire!"

I tried to make a noise but my poor tongue was dumb. I found myself in the streets surrounded by a lot of frantic women and children. I never noticed the angry flames licking up the building, but my eyes peered into the crowd of strange faces about me. Suddenly there was a terrible yell and everybody rushed toward a clump of something while lying still upon the pavement. I saw a woman's form lifted and a beautiful dead face was held toward me. Great Heaven! it was Anna's face. But where was my baby? Why had she not him with her? I looked wildly about for a child that might be my own. I heard a grief voice of one of the women say: "Here is the baby all safe but his mother is quite dead." I turned to where the man stood, holding the little fellow in his arms. I went up to him and held out my hands. It was my baby. He looked pale and weak and the lips liped: "Dat is my aser mamma." I screamed and snatched my baby, I called him once more by name and pressed him to my bosom.

I could talk, I could hear, I had found my baby, I cared for nothing now only to go back to New York and carry my darling.

I heard only that the beautiful cruel woman had leaped from her window to escape the flames and was instantly killed. While I was searching for her she was living in the same building with my own child. I took my baby home with me and a content came back, sweet and pure.

I am now an old woman, I sit in my easy chair and my son wrote this little sketch while I dictated. He has a sweet wife and two beautiful children, who are Grandma's darlings.
