Senator McNary

that will not be prohibitive. If that can be done, Senator McNary argues, the business of farming will be largely stabilized, a result which the farmers in many instances tries to attain by the diversification of crop, so if one crop fails he can "even up" with another. This in turn serves to simplify the problem of general crop insurance.

"There is no industry subject to so many hazards and vicissitudes as farming," said the Oregon senator. "A year's toll and crop investment may be destroyed in a night. This threatening possibility is one of the reasons that drives farmers to the already congested cities, resulting in a condition both uneconomic and fraught with social evils."

"The farmer's economic status is directly dependent upon nature and any legislation that tends to stabilize his crop production and minimize his losses is worthy of the most studious investigation. This has never been given the attention it merits and I propose that congress make a thorough and accurate survey, touching upon all of the elements involved."

The committee proposed, consisting of three senators and three representatives, is directed by its terms to report to congress within six months, giving its opinion, among other things, as to the practicability of creating a government crop insurance bureau.
