THE R. E. LEE.

He who trod thy quarter deck, Did all he could to save the wreck, And to his post stood manfully, Rr E, Lee.

Stout was the arm that held the wheel, Stout the heart, aye, as true as steel, That guided to shore thy burning keel, R. E. Lee.

Honor to him who 'mid fire and smoke, And quivering frame and thunder stroke Open threw thy throttle valve, The wreck to save, We mourn the dead lost on thee, The lieping babe in its infancy, Manhood in its stalwart pride, Youth m its beauty and the bride, Oh! R. E. Lee.

But for the manhood of thy crew, There would have been, alia! how few Survived to tell thy destiny, R. E. Lee.

Blend laurel with the cypress then To crown the few heroic men, Who at the post of duty stood, "Mid fire and flood.

Sadly we monra thee now as lost, Horrible was thy holocaust, Naught's left but wreck and thy fame, Linked with earth's most glorious name, H. L. Lee. —Natchez Democra: MALARIA. "The shades of night were falling fast"
As through a Jersey village passed
A youth who bore, 'mid fog and rain,
A banner with the strange refrain—
Malaria!

His brow was sad; his eye beneath Looked like a man in the throce of death; As like an empty berrei rung The accents of that ghostly tongue— Malaria!

In happy homes he saw the light
Of household fires gloom warm and bright,
Above the spectral visions shone,
And from his lips escaped a groon—
"Is this malaria?"

"Try water hot," the maiden said;
"Take quinine pills and go to hed."
The disease you've got," the doctor cried,
"Oh, yes, I see," the voice replied—
"I've got malaria!"

"Oh stay," the maiden said, "and rest Thy agued head upon this breast!" A tear stood in his bilious eye, But still he answered, with a sigh— "It is malaria!"

"Beware the night air, fog and blast!
Beware the cartoon drawn by Nast!"
This was Miss Mancy's last good night;
A voice replied, far out of sight.
"Malaria!"

At break of day, as on his way, A prous fisherman of Newark Bay Uttered his oft-repeated prayer. A groan came through the misty air—"Oh, my malaria!"

There in the twilight, cold and dead.
A vailer corpse in a malarious bed,
And from the depths, in deep despair,
A voice fell through the murky air—
"Oh, curse malaria."

MORAL. Boware, kind friends, and do not feel That every time your head does reel You have all ills that flosh is heir, And always cry, "Malaría."
