lived in Los Angelos fifteen or sixteen years ago, and, in fact, thousands of newspaper readers on the Pacific coast, will find in this article the correct solution of a series of riddles, and be enabled to penetrate the mysterious cloud that constantly enveloped two individuals who once created a great sensation in "The City of the Angels."

About twenty years ago one Eli W. Hawkins, and his wife, turned up in Los Angeles and purchased a large body of time land about fifteen miles cast of the city, in the vicinity of Old Los Nictos. Hawkins at once beran to buy all the little farms in the neighborhood. He employed an army of architects, masons, carpenters, and laborers. As the afternoon wore on an impromptu procession came from the nasy varsl, drawing six bout-howitzers, which were fired through the streets as they rolled on. This crowd, relutered by the hurrahing legions along the route, speedily swelfed to enormous proportions, and filled the whole area in front of the White House, where gons were fired and hands played while the multitude waited for a speech. The young hope of the house of Lincoln—"Tad"—made his appearance at the well-known window from which the President always spoke, and was received with great shouts of applaces, whereupon he waved a captured rebel flag, to the supraricies delight of the sovereign people below.

shortly after the scene before him was one of the wildest confusion. It seemed impossible for men adequately to express their feelings. They fairly yelled with delight, threw up one another's hats and screamed like mad. From the window of the White House the surface of that crowd looked like an agitated sea of hats, faces and arms. Quiet being restored, the President congratulated the people on the occasion which called out such increstrained enthusiasm and said that as arrangements were being made for a more formal celebration he would defer his remarks until that occasion; "for," said he, "I shall have nothing to say then if it is all dribbled out of me now."

He said that as the good old time of "Dixle" had been explured on April 9, he had submitted the question of its ownership to the attorney general, who had decided that the tune was now our lawful property, and he asked that the band abould play it, which was done with a will, "Yankee Doodle" following. Then the President proposed three cheers for General Grant and the offerers and men and the prettient carpets in that house that I have over seen in any part of the world.

Upon one occasion Hawkins bought a $1.00 carriage and hitched four white stallions to it. The people of Los Angeles were astounded to see the man himself seated on the box and lashing the horses into fory as they flew through the streets. Mrs. Hawkins was seated inside smiling, apparently unconscious of danger and perfectly happy. While they were enjoying this freak a circus and menageric came to town. Hawkins determined to join the parade, and with his white stallions comparisoned and plumed he galloped around in front of the hand wagon. The procession was entirely foo slow for him. Two or three times they circled around the procession, to the intense dissatisfaction of the circus people and the infinite delish of the crowd on the payment. People laughed themselves hoarse. After awhile Hawkins ran over a cage of wild cats. The frantle animals sprang into the street, and Mrs. Hawkins turned a dozen somersaults, which made the circus people realous of her acrobatic abilities. Hawkins' wild horses tore furiously about through the procession. The circus horses soon caught the spirit of deviltry, and officen or twenty teams hitched to cages ran away. All of Los Angeles was at the windows or on the housetops enjoying the most outrageous panorama of deviltry that mortals ever witnessed.

There are some things that are just as apparent to those who sleep late as they could blow a horn or get a born to their lips. Some people thought that Hawkins and his wife were both crazy, but that was an error. They could be as shrighed in driving a bargain as anybody when o casion required. Whenever conversation larged in Los Angeles people used to talk of the Hawkins pair and their limitless wealth.

Hawkins and a stereotyped article containing many of the facts herein related

Hawkins and his wife both died several years ago, and a stereotyped article containing many of the facts herein related floated in newspaper waters all over the civilized world for several months. The writer read it in a foreign language and in a foreign country and wondered if the mystery would ever be solved.

A few evenings ago a group of old Texans, all cattlemen, were seated in the rotunda of the Avenue Hotel in Austin when one of them asked of another. "What in thunder do you suppose ever became of Ell Hawkins? A TALE FROM TEXAS.

became of Ell Hawkins?

"Went to California with a big drove of cattle is all I know," was the reply. The first man, looking very thoughtful and throwing away his cigarette, said:

"Do you know, I always thought that Hawkins and that other fellow dug up two or three bushels of Santa Ana's gold down on the Santone River."

Then your correspondent opened his ears pretty wide and began to cultivate the acquaintance of the old Texans. This is what he got for his pains: THE MYSTERY OF A CALIFORNIA

THE PROBLEM FOLVED.

Away back in the '688 Hawkins owned a big cattle ranch and a herd of some 10,000 or 15,009 head of cattle out South of San Antonio. There had, for a long time, been a vague tradition in the country that Santa Ana had buried immense treasure on the banks of the San Antonio river
