WALTZED HER AWAY.

All society was agreed upon one point -that for me there were but two suitable fiances-my cousin Gontran, the duke de Lannis, and the Duke de Courtalin.

I saw him-at the bail of the De Fresnes. He did me the honor to dance three times with me, and I went home absolutely intoxicated with joy. But the joy was of short duration, for the next day he said to his brother, who told his sister, who told me:

"It seems that I am to marry my cousin Marceline. Last evening I was miration went deep into my heart. literally thrown into her arms. Out of pure goodness of soul I took pity on the poor little schoolgirl and danced with her three times. But there must be no more of it. I have not yet had enough of life. Besides I know of nothing more ridiculous than marriage between cousins.'

But that was not all. He also said to Robert, "I saw her in evening dress last night for the first time, and she is so thin."

That night, after Gabrielle had told me all this. I disrobed before the mirror and studied my poor little shoulders with their great hollows and had a fit of weeping. Mamma came in the middle of it.

"My angel, what is it?" She took me in her arms.

But I could not speak. The tears choked me. "My treasure, you pain me. Speak, dearest,"

Then, to reassure her, I managed to say between my sobs: "It is because I am thin, mamma! Gontran, last evening, thought I was so thin!"

Thereupon mamma began to laugh. She told me that at 17 she was much thinner than I, and she assured me very solemnly that I would certainly develop. That winter of my first season mamma took me to a dozen great affairs, but they were occasions of mourning and sorrow, for Gontran was not there.

He did not want to marry. He even told me so. I did not know then that this was by order of my mother. One day about 4 o'clock in the afternoon-it was the second day of Junemamma came into my room with a look on her face that was new to me. "My child," she said, "my child."

She had no need to say more. I understood. All the evening before at the Prince de Vearn's M. de Courtalin had been with me, and the next morning his mother had told mamma that her son knew of nothing more beautiful than my face

Mamma tried to make me listen to reason. If I refused him, I threw away a splendid chance. The Duke de Courtalin was the mark at which all the maternal guns were pointed. Great name, great position, great fortune.

For me, I had but one word to oppose to all these just and proper remarks-Gontran! Gontran! Gontran or the convent, and the most severe convent at Grant's journey east to assume general

1 returned to throw myself once more into the arms of my mother and cry out, "Yes; I shall marry De Courtalin." How many times between that and the 17th of May did I repeat the opera-tion! It came to be a settled thing that no sooner did mamma see me appear than she mechanically opened her arms to receive her daughter, crying, "Yes; I will marry Courtalin," and soon after, "No; I will not!" But the "I will not!" became more and more rare. M. de Courtalin was a inodel of tact, of kindness and of resignation. He waited, always in black, always buttoned, with inexhaustible patience. Mamma was invariably engaged with Mme. de Courtalin. At last the 17th of May arrived. It was tacitly understood that upon that evening I would say yes to the patient lover, and the engagement would be formally announced before all the world. I was restless all day and glad when 11 o'clock in the evening found mamma and me at the home of Mme. de Ver-nieux, who was giving a great ball.

suddenly their owher arose and turn-ed toward me. A glance aside showed me Courtalin slowly and laboriously making his way toward me from anoth-er corner. My cousin looked at the same time and saw him. Then it became a race between the two men. Gontran intrepidly cut through all the waltzers, but he reached me before Courtalin. He came up to me precipitately. He canght my hand; he put his arm about me. We danced gayly, wildly, furiously. What a waltz! He said to me: "I love you; I love you! You are grace and beanty itself. There is not another womlistened to his praise all the afternoon and hated him. The more he was eulogized the more I turned from him. With Gontran I could be quite at my ease, for he never impressed one with his superiority. I knew but little, but my ignorance, compared with his, was erudition.

Mme. de Courtalin had called to ask my hand for her faultless son. I do not know what mamma said to her after my refusal. I only know that I was left for awhile in peace.

And where was Gontran through the long summer? Making a tour of the world very quietly and quite at his ease. I learned afterward that this also was mamma's doing; that when he was in Japan he had brought me a number of lovely little things, placed in a tiny case that hore my name. The case had been sent to mamma, but I had never seen it.

All that year one name was sounded in my ears-Courtalin, Courtalin, always Courtalin. He had all the virtues under heaven. My determination began to weaken, I say it to my shame.

After all, what advantage there was in being a married woman! Absolute freedom would be accorded me. Then the thought of being a duchess was not displeasing.

All winter mamma displayed perfect taste and exquisite sweetness. She never urged, never tormented me. I know, nowever, that she said to her friend, de Nelly: "My dear, she will yield before the 20th of June. It must

On that date we left Paris for Aixles-Bains

And I did not continue to say no with the savage energy of last year. I only awaited Gontran's return. I knew that he would reach Paris on the 2d or 3d of April. The following day he would certainly come to see us.

And so it happened. He called about 2 o'clock, before mamma had quite completed her toilet. I was alone. I ran to

"Ah, Gontran, how happy I am to see you!"

And I kissed him without ceremony. He kissed me in return, was very much affected and began to speak such gentle, kind words that my heart melted. He found me a new creature. I was no longer thin. I had grown taller and fuller
