Since the days when the holy inquisition was a flourishing and terrorizing institution, there has seldom existed any device of man as productive of mental and physical torture as the city changing.

THE CHANGANG ON ITS WAY TO WORK

Early Thursday morning the prisoners were awakened by the loud beating of a tin pan in the hands of a trusty. Every body crawled out and tried to imagine that they had had a season of rest.

At about 7 o'clock the cell door was opened and we filed out to breakfast. It was a meager one. The same mysterious hash constituted the "piece de resistance" and the ants gambled as gaily over the bread as they had on the preceding evening.

After breakfast it was told that I would have to go out to work on the changing. Although secretly congratulating myself I pretended to be very indignant.

CLEVELAND'S NEW PREMIER

A Terrible Danger

All during the day a terrible danger to life and limb seemed imminent. Not content with forcing the city's prisoners to labor against physical disadvantages, heretofore proper food and rest, the situation is a grave one from another standpoint. A single glance at the fifty-foot wall reveals the danger. A cave-in is to be expected momentarily. Large masses of rock and stone have fallen into the cut at different times and others are partially detached and ready to fall at the east jar.

The Oregon Boat. It Weighs About Ten Pounds. It Is With This That Petty Offenders Are Manacled

During the two days' work at the place several small masses came rattling down forcing those in the vicinity to run for safety. Should a heavy fall, come the prisoners whose movements are impeded by heavy irons are almost sure to be hurled beneath the debris.

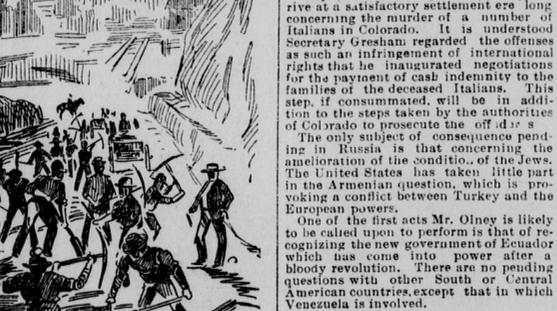

The rule to cut prison dwellings was soon accomplished under the curious stares of the public as they nudged each other and pointed to the notorious "changang." We went to our cell and had leisure to inspect my oiled hands and ruminate on the encouragement an honest man receives at the hands of society when once he becomes a "breaker."

met recovered her self-possession today and refused to discuss her troubles with her husband. Emmet himself said he had no cause for shooting his wife, and attributed his assault upon her to too much drink. Mrs. Emmet will probably not prosecute her husband and the matter will be dropped.
