Ed Turner, class '96, Los Angeles high school, is out here with Company A of the Thirteenth Minnesota, and then there are General H. G. Otis and Lieutenant Bradbury of his staff. General Otis' headquarters are at Cavite, but there are two boats each way daily and he is a frequent visitor at department headquarters.

The Philippine circus is now in full operation, but, as will appear from the program, the performance is hardly one that would ne under that head in the United States. Last week's program was as follows: -Overture by the band.

Two-Triple trapeze. Three—Hand juggling. Four—The English perch. Five-Balancing with the feet. Six-Roman rings.
Seven-Comic antics by the clowns. Part Two: One—Overture by the band. Two—Somersaults by the company. Three-Slack wire performance by a lady. Four—The mysterious ball. Five—Trapeze combination. Six-Triple horizontal bars.

The band played American music, I suppose to honor the audience which was almost entirely composed of American soldiers, and was just about such an aggrega tion of talent as one finds dispensing sounds for the American public in our own circuses.

An interesting fact showing the state of feeling among the insurgent generals may be noted from the following incident: There is, as is undoubtedly known, a cer-tain faction that wishes to form a free and independent government at once, and were even willing to undertake war with Americans to obtain this result, and to settle the matter a consultation of insurgent generals was called. The subject was discussed in its various phases and finally put to vote, the ballot standing twenty-three to seven in favor of American rule in what-

I was talking with a colonel of the insurgent army this afternoon and he told me that the insurgents would abide by any de-cision the United States might make, provided the islands were not returned Spain. Last Wednesday I had the pleasure, if such an adventure can be termed a pleasure, of attending a funeral. I was strolling along a side street of Manila, and hearing the music of a guitar and mandolin in a house across the way, I stopped a moment to listen. I had hardly been there a minute when a Filipino, who I afterwards learned was ten. I had hardly been there a minute when a Filipino, who I afterwards learned was the father of the dead child, came out, beckoned to me and asked me to come inside; his face was wreathed in smiles, and his jollity, coupled with the fact that the orchestra was at that time playing a lively waltz, led me to believe that there must be some kind on Tuesday, the 3d day of January, 1899, to pay the delinquent assessment, together of a party in progress. of a party in progress.

I entered and it was not until I had gone upstairs and into the main room that I discovered the true nature of the celebration for by no other name could it well be called. At the center of one side of the room was the family altar, without which no native the family altar, without which no native house is complete, and on a table immediately in front, feet toward the altar, head slightly raised so that if the eyes were opened the first object to meet the gaze would be the cross, was the body of a girl of 10 or 12 years, dressed in white and with a wreath of white flowers on her brow. The assembled company, some thirty or thirty-five men, women, boys and girls, were all in gala attire, and in the intervals between the musical numbers laughed and chatted much as an American audience would at a reception or musical, and none laughed or chatted more gaily than did the host and father of the dead child and his wife. The orchestra played waltzes, polkas and marches of the liveliest kind, two of three of the senoritas present sang little love songs and it really seemed to me that I was the saddest one of all.
