SLAVE AND SAINT

"YOU'D not be all that of a scoundrel, Crawford?" said Tom Downing, after a minute's hesitation, during which he looked solemnly at his friend. Crawford Sands spent that minute in shrugging his shoulders and looking elsewhere. He wore an eyeglass. The thing helped him in moments like this.

"The word 'scoundrel' may be variously defined, old chap!" he said, after a further pause.

"By men who are scoundrels according to the common meaning of the word—only by them, Crawford."

"Thanks. Well, I'm off to meet Vinny. She's coming down from town this morning. I think I told you. I hope you'll help with the boat this afternoon."

"Crawford," said Tom Downing, "do be plucky, for your sister's sake."

The two young men faced each other, and it seemed for a moment as if the reckless expression was about to flit from the eyes of Crawford Sands. But he conquered the better impulse.

"Look here, Downing," he said, "it needn't make the least difference to you. You can make love to Vinny just the same, and she'll marry you fast enough whenever you like to ask her, or I don't."

But with a rush of crimson to his tanned cheeks, Tom Downing intervened.

"That'll do, Sands," he said, quietly, "it's my turn to say 'Thanks.'"

Then he left the room and the house and it wasn't until he ran against Carruthers, of Balliol, that he realized he was hatless.

He bought a cap in one of the shops, and got into a boat and had a paddle all to himself. And while he paddled he thought:

"Was it true that Vinny Sands would marry him 'fast enough whenever,' etc.?"

The idea thrilled him. Yet what was the use of toying with the sweet hope in the present circumstances?

"Here am I, at Oxford fighting for a degree, with the world to fight afterward, and only a hundred a year to my name! Also, to some extent, I have poor Crawford's wild ways on my soul. If I had looked after him better he would never have got mixed up with that fast Dunlce lot. And, to mend it all, I want Vinny Sands."

After this reflection he rowed more furiously still, and so it wasn't perhaps wonderful that by and by he was to be seen trotting back to the rooms he shared with Crawford Sands, dribbling Thames water onto the pavement from several parts of him. Anyhow, he had managed to save from a watery grave that young counter jumper whom in his mad career he had so unfortunately spilled. It was thus that he shook hands with Vinny Sands on the landing of the lodging house. There was trouble in her pretty eyes, but it vanished quickly at the sight of him.

Crawford Sands laughed at the wet clothes.

"I'll tell you what it means, Vin," he said. "Tom tried to drown himself because I hinted that you were engaged to that Capt. What's-his-name, but he thought better of it in the nick of time."

"Crawford!" cried Vinny. "He's the same old feather-brain, Miss Vinny," murmured Tom, warmed by the reproach in the girl's voice and the glorious color in her face. And then he went off to get presentable for luncheon.

After dinner, by special request, the brother and sister were left alone. It made Tom's heart ache to think of this orphaned girl of one-and-twenty years thus tackling the position of debt and disgrace which confronted her brother of 22.

But it was worst of all in the morning. There was no Crawford at the breakfast table. Tom and Vinny sat to the meal together, and when it was over the girl explained things.

"He has committed forgery, Mr. Downing, and I have persuaded him to leave Oxford at once. He will live it down, I believe. I told him I was sure you would do what was necessary—to tell his books and things, and—"

Then she broke down, and before Tom quite knew what he was doing he had taken the girl in his arms and was comforting her as if she had been his own brave little sister.

This, however, could not last. With a miserable little smile, Vinny at length freed herself.

"Yes," she confessed, being urged. "I love you very much, Tom. So much that—but it's no use talking. Please to go off to your lecture now. By and by, perhaps—"

However, there was no such by and by for Tom Downing. The brave little Vinny just left him a note to greet him at luncheon. There was no room in her life for love at present. Crawford's responsibilities were all-absorbing.

It was vain that Tom Downing took train to London the next day and stormed the Bayswater boarding house. Vinny had left, bag and baggage, the previous evening.

Rather more than five years after he had thus lost Vinny Tom Downing went under doctor's orders to St. Leonard's. He was paying the penalty of the moderate literary success; the demands upon his brain had resulted in nervous breakdown.

The first house at which he applied for rooms could not accommodate him, but the landlord suggested that he should try next door. He did
