The Soldier Bonus Again

In another column of this issue will be found a very interesting letter containing the reaction of an ex-service man on our recent "Soldier Bonus" editorial.

Sentiment and sympathy are very largely on the side of the author of this letter. There is no room for argument when you begin to make comparisons between the soldier and the slacker, between the soldier and the profiteer, or between the soldier and the war-made millionaire.

The whole argument from our viewpoint resolves itself to a principle of remunerating able bodied men because they were unable to join the campaign of graft and greed that many men who stayed home were able to do.

If there's anything an American screen star can't understand, it's the news that the Princess Emmanuela Pignatelli has begun proceedings in France to prevent the public display of her portrait.

A school superintendent tells parents that they should cease to permit their children to be out on all-night parties.

A movement to make a national park on the site of Mammoth cave is under way.

Paris is so far off that it is doubtful if that nonbiting flea that has been developed by a French scientist can be distributed in time to do Tower much good this coming summer.

Nothing has been heard for a couple of days from the fellow who has been contending that we haven't any more of the old-fashioned mothers who can make bread.

Vessels Are the Messengers, the Servants and the Builders of Trade

By E. C. PLUMMER, U. S. Shipping Board Commissioner.

Vessels are the messengers, the servants and the builders of trade. They are almost as essential to the proper development of markets for American goods in foreign lands as is the presence of the goods themselves.

Congress, by passing the Jones law, came to the understanding how war developments had made the services of American vessels in the foreign trade of this country absolutely essential to our continued prosperity.

But the dominating fact which brings home a realization of the truth that our ships must remain on the sea is the fact that the people of this country have so increased their production that they have vast surpluses which must find markets in foreign lands or millions of people in this country will have their opportunities to produce and earn crippled or destroyed.

It is the unsold surplus that closes the factory door, that cuts off the weekly pay check, that sends men into the streets hunting for work.

Yet those direct benefits coming from American ships constitute but one feature of this national problem. Every cargo of coal, grain, manufactured goods, fruits, sent abroad, not only brings to our own people its equivalent in money or value, but it also furnishes an opportunity for our people to produce another cargo to replace that which has been sent abroad, and thus it gives additional employment both to home labor and home capital.
