

HIS picture represents a display that will be seen tomorrow for the first time, in the great G street show window of the Palais Royal. The only difference is that the one is merely printer's ink and the other is composed entirely of Handkerchiefs. The first is commonplace, the last is simply marvelous. And don't be afraid to come inside the great building—don't harbor the delusion that little stores on shoddy streets quote less prices, even for undesirable goods. Come in! The broad aisles on the many floors are as free to you as the sidewalks of the many streets. Bring the children-enjoy their delight of the spectacular displays and learn that the Palais Royal stocks are largest and most varied, and that its cash business, with gigantic buying and selling, assures lowest possible prices.
