IDLE DREAMING.

Mix we with life's many cares, With blessings rich and teeming, How we gather off its tares. On levir on! we're moving, Seeking joy that's e'erabesd, Making light of life and leving Till we're numbered with the dead

How vain we are of beauty.

How proud we are of fame:
Station-seeking, more than duty.

Bearing up a worldly name.

Mingling much of false pret nain,

With our daily intercourse;

Seeking more our power's extension

Than the justice of our course.

Is the day shead e'er coming,
When we'll see as we are seen?
When we'll case our idle reaming,
And be what we might have be n?
Or will glamore'er surrousd us,
To our spirits' sore distress,
Our own success confound us When we find it cannot bless?

PERSECUTION.

BY GASKELL.

There has never been a time in the history of mankind when some persons, or peoples, were not undergoing persecution. There are always tome of us self-sufficient, wise men, or women, who consider our duty, or mission, or life work, is to regulate the affairs of others. And now hidestriously we work at it, and how thankind they should feel for our deep solicitude and wise supervision. How eager we are to force our way into the conflicted with their fallings and imperfections and to volunteer counsel for their benefit. We are so not for our own guidance, like it was with the pious deacon, the time of service is occupied in parcelling out the strand to meet the wants of other members of the congregation, passing by ourselves entirely. We retain little, or nothing, for curselves, as our obliquity of vision is of such a character, that we can distinguish the wants and imperfections all around, but never, by any singularity of chance, taking within its cope, ourselves.

How really grateful society should the for such labors and how unjust to us it is, when like the boomerang in denominations; but it may point a proposal of the sure of the compression, or corrected that we retain the wants and imperfections all around, but never, by any singularity of chance, taking within its cope, ourselves.

Not there are some more sugreeable ways than other as some more agreeable ways than other as some more sure of en of our own eecking. But though the ways are of en of our own eecking. But though the ways are of en of our own eecking. But there would, and thouse ways are of en of our own eecking. But there ways than other as some more dere of on our own eecking. But there are some more sure, which is, there are some more dere of en of our own eecking. But there of en of our own eecking. But there are some more dere of en of our own eecking. But there ways than other as some more dere of en of our own eecking. But there ways then other as some feel of our own eecking. But there was a feel of our own eecking. But there was a feel

We will show second the sound to anything to assail our prejudence or right and how soon we pounce upon him. A John Robinson has not wealth, nor social position, nor a boat of friends and we are all popes to our own shortcomings; but let a John Rebinson has not wealth, nor social position, nor a boat of friends and we are all popes to our own shortcomings; but let a John Rebinson has not wealth, nor social position, nor a boat of friends and we are all popes to our own shortcomings; but let a John Rebinson has not wealth, nor social position, nor a boat of friends and we are all popes to our own shortcomings; but let a John Rebinson has not wealth, nor social position, nor a boat of friends and we are all popes to our own shortcomings; but let a John Rebinson has not wealth, nor social position, nor a boat of friends and we are all popes to our own shortcomings; but let a John Rebinson has not wealth, nor social position, nor a boat of friends and we are all popes to our own shortcomings; but let a John Rebinson has not wealth, nor social position, nor a boat of friends and we are all popes to our own shortcomings; but let a John Rebinson has not wealth, nor social position, nor a boat of friends and we are all popes to our own shortcomings; but let a John Rebinson has not wealth, nor social position, nor a boat of friends and we are all popes to our own shortcomings; but let a John Rebinson has not wealth, nor social position, nor a boat of friends and we are all popes to our own shortcomings; but let a John Rebinson has not our sense of right and how soon has not wealth has a let the most of the Marchet.

There is a great difference between the burthen of Christian, in his progress through this world to the next, and that of Sinbad, the sailor, when the old man of the sea got astride of his shoulders and he could not shake his shoulders and he could not shake him off, though we are too apt to make two one for the other mer is gotten rid of by a change in ourselves only, and a repentance and a furn to godliness and maintaining a correct living; but the latter can only be escaped by a change in the nature of the burthen itself. Subad had to get the old fellow drink, before the could get rid of him; and, likewise many of us are ridden by our hobbies and maintain our follies, until they ting us just as potently as the old man's heels did Sinbad, when beating the devil's fattoo on his ribs.

Hope is a good anchor, but to be of service it must be formed rightly and have good anchoring ground for it to be of much use to us. We well rebave good anchoring ground for it to be of much use to us. We well remember a good many years ago, being in a boat, anchored on the west side of Church Island, in about four feet of water. It was a goodly sized boat we were in and our anchor was bravy enough had it been made in the right shape, to have held us in all weathers. It had, however, been made in a blacksmith shop by those who knew but little how an anchor should be made, and when AMERICAN BROWN BLANKS at 12½cts. per roll.

Ithose who knew out the anchor should be made, and when anchor should be made, and when we cent it over it did not fall in the right way to hold. As the weather was mild and lovely we did not pay much attention to it then, but by and the payon of the streetly and the streetly came upon us directly. much attention to it then, but by and by a storm came upon us directly shoreward and our snehor commenced dragging and the boat got nearer and nearer to the line of tuge boulders that abruptly terminated on the edge of the lake. Of sourse there was no particular danger to like or limb, but there was danger to the boat, and to save her two of us boat, and to save her two of us jumped overboard and commenced wading out to the anchor to put it right. By watching our chances and allowing the breakers to pass over us in their furious course shoreward, we accomplished our task and the boat rode out the balance of the storm in easier. But it will not do to depend upon anchoring in shoal water at all times—sometimes great seas of tromble are around us and hope's anchor should be of right material and make, as there is like-libood of being a great moral ship-wreck. It is not in all waters and on all coasts we can jump overboard and point our anchor right for helding; nor is it at all times that our hopes can be of service to us. The wise ones of the earth do not wait for a ones of the earth do not wait for a time of trouble to propare means to meet it properly; but in time of calms, when reason and judgment are at their best; no more than we should wait for a time of rain to mend a tesky roof. But unforturately, most of us learn only by the things we suffer, and when we do suffer, just as we may arrest and deserve we are ant to go when we do suffer, just as we may expect and deserva, we are apt to go about whining at the superior blessings of others and our own estifortune. But there is one consulation even for the weary and sill cted—we will all get through the world somehow or other. A trifling, weak-kneed person was one day complaining to a friend, that for his part "be did'nt know how he was ever thight." did'nt know how he was ever to get along in life, nor could he see how he was ever to get through the world."

For his consolation his friend answered that, "he need not borlow trouble on that account—he was bound to get through somehow—as he had never heard of anyone stor-ping by the way." But when we
