Abraham Lincoln, President Roosevelt and his wife and daughter returned to Washington at 2 o'clock this afternoon. The trip consumed just fifty hours.

The return trip was practically without incident, the most interesting event being a brief speech to railroad employes at Harrisburg, Pa. In this address, which lasted little more than a minute, the president spoke of the railroad man as a model type of American citizenship, and said that because of his alertness, self-reliance and willingness to obey orders, he was just the sort of man that would be most useful in case of another war, which, however, he hoped would never come.

At many places along the road there were crowds of people, who waved their salutations as the train flew by. The president lost few opportunities.
