SENSE AND NONSENSE.

Mrs. A—, a young matron whose well regulated household had suffered at the hands of her servants, hired a Chinese boy, who was untrained but bright. As a proper manner of receiving a visitor could not impress itself on his mind Mrs. A— decided on a practical demonstration of her instructions. Explaining that she would be a visitor and that he was to answer the ring, she presented herself at the door with her card.

Sing, with a gracious smile, appeared, tray in hand, on which she placed her card, and he bowed her to a seat. Mrs. A— dismissed him, glowing with pride at her words of approval.

The following day a summons by the bell gave Sing the much-planned-for opportunity. The visitor rustled her silken way into the reception room, after placing her card on the tray of the smiling boy.

Sing himself hurried to the kitchen, where he made a careful comparison between the card just presented and that of his mistress, which he had concluded unobserved. Decided as to his course, he appeared before the visitor, and said a few words which caused a sharp retort and a hurried exit.

Intuitively Mrs. A— felt all was not well below, and hurried to inquire: "A caller, Sing?"

With determination written on his stolid face he silently handed her the card of the late visitor.

"What did you say, Sing? anxiously inquired Mrs. A—.

"Me lookie this," he replied, "me lookie that," indicating the two calling cards. "No samee—me tellie lady—not at home. Tickee no good!"
