Difficult to Say What Is the Prevailing Mode - Odd Jumbling of Styles - Discription of Evening Gowns - Hints

As the season advances it grows hore and more difficult to say what is the prevailing mode and what es-pecial period the dressmakers have gone back to for their inspiration. There is an odd jumbling of styles. bined with splendid results

Some of the conturiers have adopted the Grecian art and are making frocks with long draperies that produce a statuesque effect, while others have borrowed from such recent days as those of 1830 and have gowns that are trimmed with ruchings, short overskirts, and puffed sieeves. There are any number of Louis XV and Louis XVI costumes, some of the new figured materials being especially adapted to these styles.

In evening frocks there is the greatest latitude and one may really wear anything from ruffled tulle ball gowns to silver and gold brocaded satin. In this last I saw the other day one that was lovely. The skirt, which was was lovely. The skirt, which was mounted for perhaps three inches, was of black shot with silver and in addition it was brocaded over with huge silver flowers. It was as nar-row as it could be worn, opened slightly at the bottom on either side of the front, and had a train that was nothing more than a point, so small and narrow was it. The bodice, low in the neck, was of flesh colored tulle, over which was draped some yellowish lace, and in place of sleeves there were some wonderful ornaments made of jet and silver that were fastened on the shoulders and then fell in long festions over the arms.

There was a charming gown for a girl, made of white tulle, the skirt having three flounces, each edged with full ruchings. The upper part of the bodice was nothing but a series of ruchings, these, of course, being made of tille, and the lower part of silver brocaded cloth, which was laid in two deep folds. The sleeves of tulle reached comewhat below the elbow and they had as a finish row after row of ruching, all as light and dainty as possible.
