that which out of Pandamonium itself never was conceived of—they were slave breeders for a slave market. He regretted more than he could express this painful fact that, of all the countries of Europe, Eugland was the only one which had men in it willing to take active steps in favor of this intrindating slave Government. The other, day a member of the Government who was not a statesman, and who occupied the position of Secretary for Ireland, dared to say to an English audience, that he wished the Republic should be devided. Why, if that island, which he [Maritright] supposed, in punishment for some of its offences, had been committed to his care, [great laughter,] had attempted to secele, not to set a slave kingdom, but a flate more free even than the old Union, the Government of which that minister was a member would sake its cities and drench its soil with blood, rather than allow it to be established. [Great cheering,] But the working men were too slowly smerging from a condition far from independent to have much sympathy with slaver; if, as was said, that great meeting in London were not collected by the reputation of its promoters, the fact only proved that it was collected by the cordial and ardem sympathy of the audiency with the friends of emancipation. [Cheers.] The fact was, people had been greatly misled by the nowapapers about America, and were becoming better informed every day. We were in no way responsible for the war, but we were responsible for our sympathics. He did not blame those who desired that catastrophe. For himself, he never despaired, and would not despair. From the outburst of this great convulsion he had but one hope and faith, and that was that the result would be the ctornal freedom, grandour, and prosperity of America. [Cheer.]
