TEN STATE DROWN.

The Senate Floor.

T. R. Stuart denounced the legislation as a violation of state rights and the principle of self-government. He accused the Democratic leaders of the Senate of attempting to dictate the policies of the state and of trying to control the actions of local governments.

"The Senate," he said, "is not the place for such encroachments on the rights of the people. The state is a political entity, and its affairs should be left to its elected representatives. The Senate has no right to interfere with the local governments of the state or to dictate their policies."

Stuart also called for a special session of the legislature to consider the issue, and accused the Democratic leaders of the Senate of attempting to prevent such a session from taking place.

"The people of the state have a right to be heard on this issue," he said. "The Senate has no right to prevent them from doing so."

The Senate responded by adopting a resolution denouncing Stuart's speech as an attack on the rights of the state and the principle of self-government.

"The Senate denounces Mr. Stuart's speech as an attack on the rights of the state and the principle of self-government," the resolution said. "The Senate will continue to defend the rights of the state and the principle of self-government, and will not be deterred by Mr. Stuart's attempt to prevent the people of the state from having their say on this issue."

The Senate returned to order and adjourned.
