about feeling the pulse of the community as to the value of the recent discoveries. Correctly judging that a newspaper office is the center of information upon all subjects, he sauntered carelessly into the cramped sanctum for one of the enterprising weeklies. A mild mannered man with a wrong font eye and a flowing heard sat savenly smalling heard savenly s ing beard sat serenely smoking an after linner cubeb, and waiting for delinquent subscribers to come in. Mr Shields, careful always to preserve his assumed character of an old rancher who had been attracted by the glitter ing stories of the rich strikes at Yuma, passed the time of day with the editor and gradually drew him into conversation about the mines. The newspaper man became elequent as he described the field of riches. He adorned his phrases with the most alluring expressions at his command, and said the half hadn't been told. Mr. Shields the while, in his auxiety to learn all he could from the editor may have disclosed unusual knowledge about mines. At any rate when the paper appeared next day the first reading matter that attracted his attention was a twocolumn interview with 'Jame Shields the Montana millionaire min-

Mr. Shields has not yet invested at Yuma, though he is of the opinion that the camp has a grand future.
