PLANETS BEYOND NEPTUNE

Calculations Prove Their Existence Millions of Miles from the Sun.

The announcement made last month by M. Gaillot of the existence of two hitherto unknown planets promises to rank in importance with the discovery of Neptune in 1846 by Leverrier. M. Gaillot was formerly assistant director of the Paris Observatory, and he made known his deductions at a meeting of the Academy of Sciences. Long and intricate calculations indicate that these planets exist in space beyond Neptune, some millions of miles from the sun. Observations previously made by M. Law, of Copenhagen, and Prof. Pickering, of Harvard University, are confirmed by M. Gaillot.

M. Gaillot followed the methods of Leverrier, who, noting and studying the causes of the disturbances in the transit of Uranus, concluded they were due to the existence of another planet. Some months later the astronomer Galle, of Berlin, definitely found the planet Neptune, where it had been indicated by his French confrere. In the same way disturbances in Uranus and Neptune have given M. Kallet the basis for his investigations and deductions. He says one of the two planets should be in the region occupied by the constellation Gemini, gravitating at a distance from the sun of 45 times the distance from the earth to the sun, the unit of distance used in astronomy, or about 6 milliards 840 millions kilometers.

The other planet, he announces, is still farther away, some 10 milliards 32 millions kilometers from the sun, and in the region of the constellation Sagittarius.

However, M. Gaillot explains that these results cannot yet be taken as definite, his observations being based only on the disturbances of Uranus, those of Neptune not having developed sufficiently up to the present to enable perfect observations to be made. While the new planets may be reported from one of the world's observatories at any moment, he considers it more probable that they will not be clearly visible until 1912, when they will be in those parts of their orbits nearest to the earth.
