Winter Kill of Apple Trees

During the past spring a great many reports have reached the Experiment Station of apple trees being winter killed. In most cases it was young trees, and in some cases the older trees suffered. An investigation of this trouble indicates that in nearly every case the trees were encouraged to grow until late in the summer, and the wood was not permitted to ripen well before freezing weather set in. In some few cases summer pruning had been done, and the trees had started to grow after the pruning work, and were in a condition of secondary growth when fall weather set in. Many of these trees suffered severely. The winter kill was not, in each case, due to extreme cold weather, but to the freezing of the wood before it reached maturity. In some cases the killing did not take place every case the trees that were least matured suffered most.

The best method of avoiding this trouble is to check the growth of the trees a little after mid-summer, by withholding water in the irrigated districts, or ceasing tillage, and in some cases planting a cover crop in the orchard. The soil should not be permitted to become so dry that the trees actually suffer for water, but it should be permitted to dry sufficiently to check the check the growth of the trees. Wraping, or placing bandages about the trees will sometimes be worth while, but it is seldom necessary if the growth is properly matured.

In some localities the Rome Beauty has suffered severe loss. In some sections the Yellow Newtown and Spitzenberg have been very severely injured. The Ben Davis family has probably been less injured than any of the other varieties. The mere fact, however, that the trees winter kill to some extent the locality is not adapted to fruit grow-I hereby announce my candidacy for ing, as in most cases the trees will not ing attorney of Pend Oreille county, suffer winter injury after they reach an subject to the decision of the voters at age of five or six years.

A Couple of Live Wires

By ANDREW J. WHITNEY

Abraham Patterson was a real estate and insurance man, and Johnny Thracker was his chief clerk, bookkeeper and man of all work, besides taking care of the office, even to sweeping out. Soon after Johnny went with the real estate man the latter's daughter, aged seventeen, came into the office one morning to get some pin money and found Johnny there alone.

This visit was the beginning of a love affair between her and Johnny. Having found a visit to the office and upon him pleasant, Delia came quite until February or March, but in nearly often after that, always choosing a time when her father was out drumming up or attending to business. Mr. Patterson was consequently ignorant of the growing attachment. Indeed he was unmindful of the fact that his daughter had outgrown her doll. As for Johnny, Patterson grudged him the $10 a week salary he paid him.

One day Mr. Patterson, just as he had started in for the sale of a piece of real estate upon which the commission would amount to $1,000, fell ill and was confined to his bed. Down to the office came Delia with a note from him to Johnny stating that he must give up trying to bring about the trade and so inform the seller and a buyer to whom he had hoped to sell the property. Johnny read the note and pondered.

"What you thinking about?" asked the inquisitive Delia. "I was wondering if I could do the

"Of course you can." At that moment Mr. Wardell, the owner of the property in question, came in and asked if Mr. Paterson was yet down. Johnny replied that he was when they are not properly cared for in a trifle indisposed and wouldn't arrive the fall is not necessarily evidence that till afternoon, but he (Johnny) would do anything required in the meantime. "Tell him I've decided to take $40,000 for the property."

Mr. Wardell went out, and Johnny and Delia consulted. The consultation ended in Delia keeping office while Johnay went out to find Mr Deacon. the expected purchaser Deacon had offered $40,000, but the price was then $42,500 Johnny asked if he would buy at the price, and Deacon told him he thought be would But before he could determine positively he must make another visit to the property and look it

Johnny returned to Delia, and another consultation followed. A person had been in the office while Johnny was away from whom she had gathered that certain real estate agents of the town were getting busy about the property and a sale was likely to be made by another go-between who would gather in the commission. Delia suggested that they report to Mr. Wardell that Mr. Deacon had accepted his pended. In Jefferson county the per- offer and agreed to pay the $40,000 I'his would complete the sale so far as Mr. Wardell was concerned, and the bottom of the transaction could only

Unfortunately for these young brokers Mr. Deacon on his way to inspect the property slipped off the curb and sprained his ankle. His wife telephoned to the office information of the fact, saying that there was little doubt that he would buy the property, but one more visit to the premises was necessary and her husband could not go out on his sprained ankle for several days.

"It's all up!" moaned Johnny "I've heard on the street this morning that an agent was hunting for Mr. Wardell to offer him $45,000 for the property, but can't find him."

In comes the postman with a letter from Mr. Wardell dated in a neighboring town, asking for the contract of sale to be sent him with the customary deposit. This indicated that he considered his property sold. If the young brokers could stave him off till they could get a definite answer from Deaon the sale would be effected.

"I tell you what," said Delia. "Send him a contract and purposely make an error in it. He'll have to send it back and by that time we may get Mr. Deacon up to the point."

"Good!" exclaimed Johnny, and, taking a blank contract, he filled it out on the typewriter, writing $400,000 instead of $40,000. Then he put it in a

For the next two days the reports of offers for and sales of the property were in the air. The contract came back for correction, and the youngsters were at their wits' ends. Johnny went to the telephone and told Mr. Deacon that he'd have to "Yes" then or never. Deacon got a carriage, made his inspection, stopped at the office on his return and signed a contract of purchase with check for forfeiture.

As Johnny was going out of the office with him a broker came in and said: "I've got a contract of purchase signed for the Wardell property for $46,000. I can't find the owner. If you'll tell me where he is I'll divide commissions."

"Don't know anything about it." said John as he jumped into a cab and was driven in a hurry to a station. He got Wardell's signature and was back in town at 10 o'clock the next morning.

That day Patterson came to the office in care of his daughter. Johnny told him the story and showed him the contract. The real estate man looked from one to the other of the two youngsters, then hugged both.
