PUBLIC HEALTH

A Series of Articles by Dr. Charles S. Rosenbury, Secretary South Bend Board of Health.

MEASLES AND WHOOPING COUGH.

There is a widespread notion that measles and whooping cough are mild, unimportant diseases of childhood. Some there are who even believe it best to expose their children to these diseases and "have them over".

For the past 12 years the death rate from measles and whooping cough ran practically parallel with that of scarlet fever. In the registration area of the United States (representing about 83 per cent of the total population) for 1912 there were 5,619 deaths from whooping cough, 4,246 from measles and 4,038 from scarlet fever.

Measles and whooping cough are not alone to be avoided because they are so often fatal but they leave after-effects and complications which are in themselves dangerous, as tuberculosis, pneumonia, ear disease, heart and kidney disease and asthma.

Last spring the health department made an effort to reduce the number of cases of measles and whooping cough. It is not necessary to quarantine the household but it is desirable to isolate the patient from susceptible children. It must be admitted that the attempt was not an unqualified success. Many cases were not reported. These diseases are usually considered so unimportant that physicians are rarely called, unless there is some complication. Many do not know that in case there is no attending physician it is the duty of the parents to report to the health department. This is the state law and not a local requirement. In many instances where warning cards were placed no attention was paid to them. The health department has gone as far as it can when it places the card upon the house and advises the public of the nature and danger of the illness therein. If parents knowingly and willingly visit, with their susceptible children, the home where warning quarantines have been established, they are guilty of spreading these diseases. Particular care should be exercised not to expose young children under five years of age, as over 90 per cent of the fatal cases occur in this period.

The prevention of measles is difficult enough because it is one of the most communicable of the infectious diseases and it is most contagious before the eruption appears. School children therefore should be examined every morning before they go to school and if they show signs of a cold, infection of the eyes, running of the nose, cough or sore throat, they should be kept at home or sent home if found ill by the teacher.

The prevention of whooping cough is also a difficult task. It is contagious before as well as after the appearance of the whoop. Patients with whooping cough should not be confined to the house but should be permitted to go about in the open air, provided they do not come in contact with other children.

When the nature of these supposedly simple diseases becomes better known and the difficulty experienced in controlling and preventing them better understood, it will be possible to secure more intelligent and willing cooperation on the part of the public.

The only way this means that any reduction in the number of measles and whooping cough cases can be accomplished.

Every illness in childhood should be treated with suspicion; it may later prove contagious. It is not always possible to make a positive diagnosis from the early symptoms, in fact, most of the contagious diseases are ushered in by the same symptoms. The "safety first" rule is this: Keep well children away from those who are ill, or, at least, until it is definitely known they suffer from non-contagious disease.
