HOLD ONE, HUNT FOUR MORE IN WYATT ROBBERY

Thieves Fail to Secure Loot After Dynamiting Heavy Door to Bank Vault.

Richard Fick of nowhere in particular is under arrest, and deputy sheriffs are seeking two members of a section gang on the Wabash railroad, missing from work, and two young men of Wyatt, who have not been home since Thursday night, following the escape of what is believed to have been a gang of six men who dynamited the outer door of the vault of the Farmers' bank at Wyatt early Friday morning in an unsuccessful attempt at robbery. The detonation aroused the neighborhood and the men were forced to flee, leaving their tools, which they had secured from the nearby railway, behind them. Although followed by bloodhounds, the men escaped by using a handcar, stolen at Wyatt, which was later found 15 miles south of the little town on the Wabash road.

"Their Second Honeymoon"

WHERE MADGE HID HER FATHER'S MESSAGE.

When I had finished my careful inspection of the Chinese vase which had been left me as a precious legacy by my little mother I decided not only that it was the very thing I needed in which to hide the important paper my father had entrusted to me, but that I could also continue keeping it in the perennially fresh blossom with which I had supplied it since my mother's death.

With hands trembling from excitement I tried a little preliminary experiment. Into the bottom of the vase, through the slender neck, I pushed down with the button-like knob of a hat pin a piece of absorbent cotton. Then I inserted into the neck of the vase one of the empty metal pencil cases I had bought of the spy masquerading as a peddler.

To my intense gratification it was not too large for the opening, and, thanks to the absorbent cotton, it came to rest on the bottom of the vase without any click. Shaking the vase also failed to produce any noise, and I began to breathe more freely. I filled the vase again with water, put back the flower, and then holding it to the light, looked it over carefully in the fear that some shadow through its wonderful coloring would betray the presence of the alien thing inside it. But its appearance was exactly the same as before. I was sure that no one would ever dream of looking inside it.

So far, so good. My next problem was the extraction of the pencil case whenever I should wish to do so.

The Very Thing. To test it I took out the flower again, emptied the water, and turned the vase upside down to see whether by any chance the pencil case would slip out again, something I wished to guard against. But there was no sign of its appearance, and I proceeded to the last and most crucial step of my experiment, the thought of which had made the idea of the vase possible in the first place.

One of my favorite childish pastimes was experimenting with magnets or different kinds. Jack Bie-kett, my brother-cousin, who was the playmate of my childhood, shared my enthusiasm, and many a happy and absorbed hour we spent with our treasures. Neither of us ever quite relinquished the childhood hobby, and Jack used often to bring me queerly shaped magnets he had picked up in his travels. Katherine Sonnot, his fiancée, and my friend, knew of this hobby which we shared.

MARKET PRICES TAKE BIG SLUMP

Vegetables and All Other Farm Products Sell at Low Figures.

Hooray! Prices on the city market took a decided slump Saturday morning, not only on vegetables and fruits but on eggs and other farm products.

Prices were lower than formerly but considerably more was for sale than at any other day during the season. There were 51 farmers with their wares and five or six city grocers and hucksters present.

Estimates by many present during the morning placed the attendance at from 2,000 to 3,000 people. Baskets and machines filled with farm produce kept the streets on both sides of the bridge crowded.

Sweet corn that has formerly been selling at 20 and 25 cents a dozen was sold in wagon loads at 14 and 15 cents. Eggs took a drop from Tuesday's market at 60 cents to 50 cents Saturday. Potatoes, which sell at 80 and 90 cents a peck in groceries, sold on the market at 70 and 75 cents a peck. Tomatoes dropped from $2.25 to $1.25 and apples of various kinds sold at three and four cents a pound.

Vegetables and small garden truck sold as usual five and ten cents a bunch. But a very few peaches were on the market, most of those being white clingstones which were sold for $3 per bushel. Elbertas and goldrops are scarce in Michigan according to Michigan fruit dealers that attend the market, but a sufficient quantity of California Elbertas will arrive in the city in the hands of wholesale dealers and will be sold at from $4 to $4.50 a bushel.

and when I had last seen her she had laughingly handed me a small parcel.

"Jack asked me to give this to you when I should next see you," she said. "If I couldn't have him collect something different than that stuff!"

Who Has Seen? Her voice was full of playful scorn, which did not disturb me in the least, for I knew it was but teasing banter. I drew from the package a magnet such as I had never seen before, a long slender bar with a queer looking cap or protector on the end.

"Jack says if you keep that protector on it the thing will stay magnetized for many a long year," his pretty fiancée said, eying the magnet with pretended disfavor. "Look at her, Lillian. She's as pleased as if Jack sent her a box of roses."

"He may keep the roses for you, my dear," I said placidly. "For my part I much prefer the magnet."

"All right, little ditty ditty. Go play with your nice play thing!" Katherine mocked, and the incident had ended. But I blessed Jack's remembrance of my childish predilection as I took the queer looking bar from my desk, removed the protector from it, and gently inserted the magnet into the vase.

Click! The sound told me that the metal case had been drawn to the end of the magnet, and in another second, magnet and pencil case lay upon my bed. Even with success assured I stood for a moment shaking as with a chill.

The remembrance of the imminence of Dicky's home-coming roused me. His train must be late, I thought for to my excited imagination the time I had spent in experimenting with my vase seemed almost hours. I looked at my watch, and to my astonishment found that the whole proceeding had occupied less than five minutes. I still had five minutes before time for Dicky to come home.

The ping inside the pencil case in which I had put the oil slick in closed message to be sure I had the right case I fastened it securely, put it into the vase, filled the vase again with water, put in the carnation I had taken from it and replaced the vase upon my dressing table. Then I locked the other pencil cases and the magnet securely in my trunk and turned to my mirror to see if my hair was disarranged.

Then it was that a slight scratching noise outside my door startled me, sent the color from my face as I stood confronting my image in the mirror.
