THE GREEN THAT WALKED By JOHN L. CONSIDINE

"Captain," said the man on Post No 13, "I'd like to be relieved. A couple of weeks' rest might put me right again."

"What's the matter? Sick?"

"Not exactly that, captain. It's my eyes; I've been seeing things." The captain of the guard eyed the man sharply.

"Been drinking?"

"No, sir. "It's not that-no pink rats nor blue monkeys, nor anything of that sort. The fact is," and here he lowered his voice to the level of a confidential whisper, although the nearest man was the guard on Post No. 12, three-score yards away, "I've been seeing the grass walk."

"What's that?" snapped the captain. "It's a fact, sir. I didn't pay so much attention to it at first, but now that it's happened three times, I'm beginning to think that my eyes are going back on me, or else that I'm getting hallucinations." The captain looked at Guard No. 13
