New York, August 22. After being defeated once by Johnny Nelson, and on another occasion refusing to meet him, Jimmy Michael yesterday quit in his twenty-five mile motor-paced race at Bridgeport with Nelson. Two thousand bicycle enthusiasts were isappointed.

In the seventh mile, when apparently he was riding in good form, the "Welsh Rarebit" suddenly refused to follow his pacemakers and left the track. Nelson, however, continued the race and finished in 42 minutes 11 1-5 seconds. There were several stories current as to the reason Michael left the track; one being that he sprained his leg, another that he had cramps, and the latter explanation, his H. Kelling, treasurer, and Grand Master trainers say, is correct.

The race was scheduled for 4:45 P. M., but Michael did not appear until about 5:15, and at 5:30 the race was started, with Michael at the pole. He caught his pace had gone half a lap. In the first lap Nelson gained about a length and a half, which lead he held throughout the mile. PRESS COMMITTEE.

"There is a neglected house on Moun Auburn street, Cambridge, Mass., opposite Mount Auburn Cemetery, that without doubt is indebted for much of its Ill-repute to its late owner and occupant John Hyde," writes Samuel S. Kingdon of "The Haunted Houses of New England," in the August Ladies' Home Journal." "It was long known as a haunted house, and avoided as such by the superstitions. Its sole earthly tenant frequently threw out mysterious hints of strange visits he received from materialized spirits who favored him with messages from the other world. He took so much pleasure in their society that he was ance of earthly visitors, and few cared to cross the threshold, for he was no to cross the threshold, for he was not averse to telling them they would not be acceptable to his relatives. There is one man who is confirmed in the belief that he, at least, was not wanted. One dark and stormy night he sought shelter on the piazza of the house, and hearing noises within he tried to discover whence they proceeded by peering through a broken pane of glass. The room was dimly lighted and he says he saw Mr. Hyde in close communion with two sheeted figures. At the same instant the intruder was blinded by a flash of lighting followed by a crash of thunder and thrown into the middle of the street. He never repeated the experiment of eavesdropping on ghosts.

rding to a story circulated in Berlin, the Emperor appeared at 6 o'clock one morning most unexpectedly at the barracks of a dragoon regiment. The soldiers nanding officer had not yet arrived. The Emperor waited half an hour, when the delinquent arrived. His feelings at the sight of his sovereign can better be imagined than described. But the Emperor did not say a word. He assisted at the manoeuvers, made general observations, as usual, and finally left without addressing a word to the officer at fault, who considered himself lost, and who went home in despair and awaited his fate. But the afternoon passed, then the evening and still nothing occurred. He had not dared to leave the house, in dread of the events hat were to decide his future career. Finally, as the evening wore on, a little ackage was left at his house, addressed a himself. No letter or message accomanied it. He hastily opened the mysteries parcel, and found it contained an arm clock.

HUXLEY AS A LECTURER

The Scientist Was Nervous and Always Fearful of a Breakdown. It is very singular that, although, as admitted by all who heard him, he was one of the clearest and most eloquent of clentific lecturers of his time, he always disliked lecturing, and the nervousness from which he suffered in his early days was never entirely overcome, however lit-tle apparent it might be to his audience. After his first public lecture at the Royal institution he received an anony mous letter telling him he had better no try anything of the kind again, as what ever he was fit for it was certainly no giving lectures. Instead of being disc aged he characteristically set to work to mend whatever faults he had of styland manner, with what success is we known. Nevertheless he often told me of the awful feeling of alarm which always came over him on entering the door of the lecture room of the Royal institution or even the College of Surgeons, where the subject was not familiar and the audience entirely sympathetic.

He had a feeling that he must break down before the lecture was over, and it was only by recalling to his memory the number of times he had lectured without drawing conclusions as to the improbability of it occurring now that he was able to brace himself up to the effort of beginning his discourse. When once fairly away on his subject, all such apprehensions were at an end. Such experiences are of course very common, but they were probably aggravated greatly in Huxley's case by the ill health, that miserable, hypochondriacal dyspepsia which, as he says himself, was his constant companion for the last half century of his life.—Sir W. H. Fowler in North American Review. came over him on entering the door o
