

MANERS OF THE BRITONS.

Not as Nice as They are Represented—Even the Princesses and Duchesses are Rude as Compared to the Average American Lady.

HE other day a professedly well-informed lady said to me: "In looking at the styles of dress worn by American women, does it ever occur to you that, although we get most of our costumes from Paris, we take our accompanying manners from London?"

"Polite Americans are always astonished," she said, "on finding themselves in the company of a man who, through a smart wedding, a state occasion, or a ball, or a grand garden fete, at any of those functions ladies of high degree may be seen following their way, just like the rude crowd of the country fair, and the dismayed Yankees find themselves disarmed and trampled by the vigorous arms and ruthless feet of dowager duchesses, who, with the loftiest and most distinguished of the aristocracy, are in a dozen mantles, or assault with the vigor of their less energetic sex, in the wild endeavor to get the best for their money."

AN AMERICAN INSTITUTION.

A New Industry for Indigent Women.

HE newest industry for indigent gentlemen is surely gaining ground with us. It is, moreover, an American one, so the English who failed to find footing here in the person of a woman who examined in London to do the family spinning for the four hundred. We can do our own spinning, but our family mending, our buttons and button-holes, our lace and all those things that used to be done by the formation of the new industry I am going to tell about. It was started by a highly respectable and energetic man, who being left in straitened circumstances, and having been all his life too much occupied with domestic and parochial work to acquire any money, was obliged to turn to the usual sort, turned her facility with the needle into the means of a livelihood. She began by going to the houses of her personal friends for a day's visit and in the rain water, and so on through all the possible things in creation. It is even related of one great beauty that she was bathed every day in fresh bullock's blood while it was yet warm.

It would occupy the whole LEDGER to recount the stories current of the ridiculous ideas held by the ancients as to different means to preserve or restore their charms, and few of them would be of service in the light of science.

The most of the so-called cosmetics, from the very beginning of the use of them, were based upon poisonous substances, just as they are to-day, and we read in a book on Egypt that a paste made of an arsenical preparation was used over four thousand years ago.

It would be a curious study to show in what beauty consists, according to different ideas, in different countries, though, according to their lights, the women in each do the most they can to render themselves attractive, and in all countries women have, and always will, rely upon the use of cosmetics of one kind or another to enhance their charms or conceal the ravages of time.

To impress upon those who may read this series of articles the fact that they are taking their lives, even, into their hands, to say nothing of the ruin they are doing to their health, we shall tell them something of the materials which enter into the compounding of the various preparations now in the market, and which are said (by the makers) to be entirely harmless.

LETTERS FROM THE CORNERS.

NECK-OR-NOTHING HALL, KILKENNY CORNERS.

R. EDITOR: Quick as a flash, William Henry's swiftness, where he was stung by the bees, hedged down him, we started for Susan Jane's. She lived about 49 miles from a town, John Jones, but as you had to go in a wagon all the way, we'd have to camp on the night, the widow was tickled to death with the idea of camping.

"It'll be just like gipsies or injuns," she said. John Jones had intended to take us, but he wanted to see the bees, so he got a man to drive the team for us, an he took us the way, so we couldnt possibly miss it, as we started.

"O, dear!" said the widow; "of I'd only a think to ask John Jim if this fellow was a married man, an' there she wurried over et till we stopped for dinner, an' then when we went to lode up agin she got in to the sete with him, an' she said: 'It's a butful kinty we're a passin' thro'; just see the lark they rests above our hed's, an' then she's to rest into them huge trees that grows on yander grassy nole.'"

"Humph!" them had make fast class posts," she he, a squirtin' tobaccoer juce.

"O, yes, indeed!" she the widder; "an' then only think how nice them post's wood look a surrondin' sum vine kivered cottage, where a young couple dwell in love an contentment, with flowers in front an' along the green broad path, an' a vegetable patch on the back, where the young wife cood go to fetch vegetables to prepare for the dinner of the one man in the world she so fondly loved. O! what a picture of love and piece that simple word posts bring to my mind," an' she leaned a leetle closter to him an' said:

"Gid yu, Daxter," she he, a-squirtin' more tobaccoer juce. The widder looked at him kindly crus like, an' William Henry he started to snigger rite out, but I tromped on his corn, an' thet changed his tune. "Gol ram it! Hester Ann, if yure feat air so big yu kaint keep from trompin on a feller, I'll let mine hang out; an' he put em onto the outside of the wargin-box, an' the wargin he pacified it wem time to camp for the nite, which we dun by a-puttin' up a pole, with sum ole quilts an things onto it that Mariah hed us to make a tent out of. Well, we et our supper that Mariah hed sent along—a ham bone an sum cole beans an rosn' years. The widder an me was a-goin to sleep in the tent, an' William Henry an the man that was a-drivin' us, in the wagon."

Well, we all went to bed just like gipsies, so Dolly said, an there coodnt be a ben a more romantik spot, I don't beleave.

I went to sleep rite off, fur I was tired as I cood be. I don't think I hed ben to sleep over a haf a nout—it mite hev ben 35 minnits, but not more than that, when the widder jacked to holler: "I'm snak bit! I'm snak bit!" Send fur the doctor! Take him off! he's a bit'n' me!" an' other like things, an' she out o' the tent an' threw the bresh an' grass like a crazy cat; an' et was a plumb' j' hour afore William Henry an' me an' the other man cood run her down an' find what was the matter.

"I'll dye of the rabbits," she hollered, a-rubb'n' her face, an' I knock'd, an' insid' o' findin' a snak a-hangin' in' to her, it wain't nothin' only a pinck-bug, or stag beetle, or some call 'em, 'You'd better go a-campin' agin,' ses William Henry. But she made a slap at him with her slipper, an' hit him betwix the shoulders, but didn't do no serous dammage, so we all went back to bed agin.

THE PRESERVATION OF BEAUTY.

According to the Laws of Health. HE care and preservation of female beauty has been a study from the earliest history. Even in the Bible we read of the arts that women have employed to enhance their beauty, and history and tradition have preserved some strange things to believe. Noted beauties have been mentioned as having taken baths of wine, of asses' milk, of milk and honey, and many other things to preserve their charms.

It is said by historians that some of the renowned beauties bathed in dew, collected by slaves, and others again in rain water, and so on through all the possible things in creation. It is even related of one great beauty that she was bathed every day in fresh bullock's blood while it was yet warm.

It would be a curious study to show in what beauty consists, according to different ideas, in different countries, though, according to their lights, the women in each do the most they can to render themselves attractive, and in all countries women have, and always will, rely upon the use of cosmetics of one kind or another to enhance their charms or conceal the ravages of time.

FASHIONS FOR GENTLEMEN.

Some Suggestions for Heavy Swells.

REEN in the invisible dark shades will be a color remarkably seen in mixed suits and spring overcoats. The designers of fine cloth fabrics seem to have made a color that moves to give these rich and subdued colorings an opportunity to overcome the prejudice which has heretofore existed against them.

In diagonals and in wide wale goods for the winter season, the dark-green shades are quite effective to a quite irrisistible degree.

The double-breasted long sack reefing jacket, made to fit loosely, is the bright particular hit of this season in the clothing business.

Well-made trousers are seen at their best under the present accepted vogue as to measurements. The tendency toward the baggy bottom revival has been implicitly checked. The correct trousers are now cut reasonably snug about the hips with a straight fall and a slight sharp taper toward a point at the bottom.

Aside from the crush hat, the tall silk stovepipe is the only appropriate headgear to be worn with evening dress. Swelldom will welcome the opera hat back again when the proper time arrives, for the silk hat is, upon occasions, very much in the way and decidedly inconvenient to manage.

Some of the ultra swells will wear light waistcoats when the thermometer is down near freezing point. The material is washable, but infinitely warmer than the summer textures.

The figured waistcoat is the one sopping case in the latest fashion-molders this season to the small army of men with ready money to spend in costume, and possessing a well-defined penchant for the natty and picturesque in dress.

In the way of styles and beauty of workmanship the American manufacturers of canes and umbrellas long since distanced European competitors. These articles come forth in wondrous multitudes, and when the thermometer is down near freezing point, the material is washable, but infinitely warmer than the summer textures.

How the Infants Shoot.

A charming young public school teacher, with a very lively set of young charges, is responsible for the following tales, which appear in the Washington Post. She told the youngsters to write compositions on "Good Manners." This was the most unique, by an eight-year-old:

"Good manners is keeping your fresh mouth out of other people's business." The teacher drew a picture on the blackboard of a boy wading in the water holding a crab in the net. Little Jules Garnier wrote:

"The crab was on the board is not a deviled crab, but a salt water crab." Is the dime novel disappearing from the hands of innocence? It looks that way. The teacher read her pupils a short Indian story. They listened with open-mouthed interest.

"—and tomahawk flew by the boy's head and buried itself in a tree." Now, I don't know how many of you know what a tomahawk is.

"No, no," she answered, "you did not." "Well, well, take it out of this," and Brown paid his bill.

The next day the proprietor met Brown coming away from the cashier's desk. He looked to see if he were going to pay the thirty cents, and noticing that he did not, he tapped him on the shoulder as he was going out.

"I am sorry to interrupt you, Mr. Brown, but you owe us thirty cents for a lunch that you had here the other day."

"Oh, that's all right," said Brown. "I had forgotten entirely about it. Well, here you are, a quarter and a nickel, that'll make it square, won't it?"

"That'll be all right, Mr. Brown," said the proprietor, as he pocketed the cash.

The day following Mr. Brown took his lunch at his usual table, and the waiter, seeing it was a good opportunity, and having noticed that he did not pay his thirty cents at the cashier's desk the day before, said:

"Mr. Brown, you remember the thirty-cent check you owed two or three days ago?"

"No," said Brown. "I don't. What about it?"

"Well," said the waiter, "you didn't have the money to pay it that day."

"Hain't I," said Brown. "Well, I will pay it now, and that will make us all right, won't it?"

"Certainly," said the waiter, and Brown for the third time forked over the thirty cents.

As Brown was paying his check that day the waiter planked down the thirty cents which he had just collected and said:

"That's for Mr. Brown's lunch the other day."

"What other day?" said the proprietor, who stood there.

"Why, Mr. Brown owed us thirty cents, you know."

Getting the Wrong Horse.

While on the survey of one of the Texas railroads we had with us one of the meanest horses a man ever saw. He was fair to look upon, but he had traits which caused a threat to shoot him every hour in the day. The man who approached that horse when he was feeding put his life in peril. One day when we were in temporary camp "Old Satan," as we called the horse, wandered away from the other animals to richer pasture. He was feeding at a distance of about forty rods and in grass knee-high, when one of our men who had climbed a tree to get a look at the country called down to us in a low voice: "Boys, there's fun ahead. A Comanche is working his way through the grass to steal Old Satan. Don't make a move, but wait for orders."

We waited. The Indian had come out of a dry ditch a mile long on purpose to steal one of our horses and have something to boast of. He must have chuckled with delight when the best-looking horse in all the lot walked right down to him and asked to be run off. In about five minutes the dusky thief was near enough for his purpose. Perhaps the horse saw him—perhaps not. The first thing we saw, however, was an Indian on horseback. He uttered a yell of triumph and tried to start the horse off, but Old Satan stood straight up and shook him loose, and the fellow had scarcely touched the earth before he was seized, hither and thither, and walked all over.

We ran to the spot and drove the horse away, to find the Indian unconscious. He was a sad sight to look upon resembling a man who had been run through a threshing machine, and it was all of half an hour before he opened his eyes.

We gave him whiskey, signed to him that he might go if he could, and he rose up with a great effort and sneaked. —[New York Sun.

The Old, Old Story. A little cough, a feeling ill, a headache, or a daily chill, a sore throat, a quivering death, a frequent fall, a coming death, no strength to rise from day to day, no rest, no sleep, no appetite, no life left in the weary head.

Such is the progress of consumption. How often is repeated the same old story, "I have been ill for years, but I don't know what to do, and I am getting weaker every day."

About Health-Keeping.

By strict attention to the general laws relating to health many persons may pass through "the grip" epidemic, or even the worst epidemic, without an attack of the disease, who, by neglecting such precautions, would equally suffer with others. The object of each individual should be to preserve himself in the best possible state of general health. For this purpose it is not necessary or proper that he should make any great change from his ordinary habits of life. All those causes which are known to make extraordinary draughts on the nerve-centres of organic life should be carefully avoided, while all means adapted to impart increased vigor to those centres should be equally cultivated. —[The Ledger.
